There were some men in advance of their age who have learned to think of the whole life of Christ in its unity as a life for and with man crowned by his vicarious death and resurrection. Irenæus, in particular, is worthy of special mention and enduring honor as the first of the fathers to bring out the unfolding of all the stages of human life in Jesus Christ; and even though he had never written another word than this, he deserves to be immortal in the memory of the church for having said: "The Son of God became a child among the children in order that childhood might be made holy." This sentence holds the heart of Christmas. But it was not until long after it was uttered, it was not until the latter half of the fourth century, that the church at large began to feel and to unfold its meaning. Then it was that she emerged from the storm of persecution into the sunshine of imperial favor. Then she saw that she had a work to do here on earth in the cleansing and adorning of human life with the beauty of holiness. Then she realized that patient suffering and faithful death were not the only duties of the Christian, but that following God in love, it was possible to begin in this world the purity and peace of heaven. Then she began to feel the wondrous significance of the living entrance of the Son of God into the life of man, and his perfect holiness in every human relation. Then she passed from the lower conception of a church saved out of the world, to the higher conception of a world to be saved through the ministry of the church, a natural year to be transformed by reverent devotion and wholesome piety into the Christian year, a redeeming life as an atoning death of Christ, to be preserved in living remembrance by the perpetual commemoration of its chief events. Then it was that, opening her heart to the humanity of religion, she began to draw near to the humanity of Jesus, and to seek with eager interest for the day of his birth, that she might make it holy.

But what clew was there to direct the search? What reason could be given for choosing one day rather than another for the Christmas festival? The gospels, always meager in dates, were quite silent here. They gave no hint of the day or month of the Nativity. Oral tradition, we may be sure, was equally reticent or indifferent. There were, indeed, a few scattered suggestions of the date of Christ's birth floating here and there among the writings of the fathers, but these were all of late origin, manifestly unhistorical, and above all quite contradictory. Clement of Alexandria said the many Christians regarded the 20th of May as the day of the Nativity, others preferred the 20th of April, but he favored November 19. In the Eastern church the 5th or 6th of January was celebrated as the day of Christ's baptism, and Nativity was joined with this on no better grounds than a forced interpretation of Ezekiel, i. 1-3, as a prophecy of the incarnation. Others again like the 21st of March as the day of Christ's birth. Between such varying and slightly-supported assumptions there was little to choose. A historical date was clearly out of the question. Nothing was left for the church to do but to select some day on grounds of convenience and symbolic significance, and celebrate it by common consent as Christmas Day.

It would take too long for me to trace the many reasons which led to the choice of the 25th of December. It was doubtless connected by a process of deduction with the day which has already been generally accepted as the common date of the Annunciation and of the creation of the world. Assuming that the world was made in the Spring, because it was commanded to bring forth grass and herbs, and that it was made when light and darkness were equally divided, because "the evening and the morning were the first day," it was natural, though somewhat naive, to fix upon the vernal equinox (according to the Julian calendar, March 25th) as the exact date of the creation. He who could question the value of such a straightforward and scriptural argument as this must have had more logic and less piety than belonged to the early Christians. And once having been discovered by this easy method the very day on which the world came into being and the glorious light sprang out of darkness, what more simple than to assume that power of the Almighty overshadowing Mary, and the day-spring from on high began his entrance into the world? Nothing could be plainer. Even the least imaginative of chronographers could reckon forward from this fixed point of the Assumption nine months, and arrive at December 25 as the day of the Nativity. And here another wonderful coincidence meets him. This is the day of the winter solstice, the day when the world's darkness begins to lessen, and the world's light to grow; the day which the ancient world had long celebrated as the birthday of the sun—dies natalis solis invicti—what more appropriate day could be found for the birth of the "Sun of Righteousness!" "Behold, my brethren," says St. Augustine, "another instance of the wondrous fulfillment of Scripture. St. John the Baptist is born on July 25, the Summer solstice, when the sun begins to decline. The Lord Jesus is born on December 25, the Winter solstice, when the sun begins to ascend. And in this is fulfilled the saying, 'He must increase, but I must decrease.'"

The earliest mention of Dec. 25, as Christmas Day is found in an ancient catalogue of church festivals about 354, A. D., and it is surprising to see with what alacrity the date was received and the Nativity celebrated throughout Christendom. It seems as if the world had been waiting for this festival of divine and human childhood, and was ready to welcome it at once with songs of joy. In the year 360 it was already celebrated in Rome by vast multitudes of people thronging the churches. Twenty years later Antioch had taken it up with great enthusiasm. And in little more than fifty years from the earliest suggestion, the observance of Dec. 25 as the day of the Nativity had become the universal practice of Christians. St. Chrysostom, in a Christmas sermon preached at Antioch, called it the fundamental feast, or the root from which all other Christian festivals grow.—Dr. John J. VanDyke, Jr., in Harper's Magazine.

"Professing to be Wise, They Became Vain in Their Imaginations."—Rom. i. 22.

The Christian preaches "not himself, but Christ Jesus, the Lord."

Jesus came as the Revealer of the Father, and dispenser of the Spirit. The Spirit took of the things of Christ, and showed them to the apostles for the work of their apostolic office. John xv. 26, 27.

In all this we have the doctrine of the Lord, "Father, Son, and Spirit." Corresponding to this, (however wonderful it is,) we have the Christian personality portrayed in "your whole spirit, soul, and body."

Now, to apply as we advance, who, but the vainly wise, ventures to take the central terms, Jesus and soul, and make them exclusive, baptising in the name of Jesus only, against Mark xxviii. 19, 20; and asserting that "the soul" is the saint, glorified at death, ignoring the resurrection and Christ our example!

We are admonished to "Be watchful, and strengthen the things that remain—for I have not found thy works perfect before God.—Your adversary, the devil, as a roaring lion, seeketh whom he may devour, whom, resist steadfast in the faith!"

The Divine hold on humanity and our victory centre in this steadfast faith! Yet under the solemnities of impending judgment, some discard the authority of Christ's commission to Matthew, so far as to take out at pleasure, from chapters i. and ii., and the formula of baptism, ch. xxviii., and the end of the wicked as tares, etc ch. xiii.

This vain example and presumptuous habit became strong among us by changing the "four" forms of Gentile empire into "five" Russia Triumphant" p. 8. It ignores God's manifold number "four," Jer. xv. 3; Dan. ii. 40; vii. 2, 7, 17, 19, 23. Rev. i. 16, 23; etc.

Nay, it ignores Rome's relation to Christ, and his cause, the destruction of Jerusalem,—the treading down power of an age—and the judgment of this Gentile æon! But all the prophetic imagery, history, geography, and chronology, Rev. xvii. to xix. fare all Roman.

However, the assurance of personal wisdom in its author, with a general lack of it in his readers, seemed to give plausibility to the assumption to those who "liked to have it so."

Then, one in his zeal for the novel notion of "Russia Triumphant, and Europe chained," presumed to publish "Russia" as "the scarlet colored beast," Rev. xvii.

But the facts of Rome's relation to the first advent, the martyrdom of the saints—her seven mountains, her harlot church, etc., was noted, also that the Russian Capital was modern, and at the confluence of some seven rivers, and nine canals—had no such geography, no such mountains, nor any like relation to God's cause and Christianity! These facts asserted attention and the point seemed given up by the publisher and printer.

But then its author's standing seemed at stake; so he came to the rescue. But, unmindful of the facts noted above, as embodied in, and fundamental to, the prophecy, his language was: "True the imagery and history are Roman but Russia will become Roman when she takes her place on the Roman habitable." This is the sum of the vindication. Note the easy answer.

The conqueror—subverted and inverted was made the conquered! The lion, on consuming the lamb, was presumed to become the lamb!!

Note. This outcome may illustrate many mistaken struggles among us, to seem wiser than prophets and apostles, and so to take the lead of faith. But instead of echoing the word "four" for four; or of spreading the light of Revelation, these writers reveal their own misapprehension of the subject in hand! For thus it must be with all attempts to seem wiser, or, in some way greater than God!

Hence, all who presume to lead off, lead only like Solomon, to "vanity of vanities."

The first and last of St. Matthew belong alike to that gospel, and God's care over his Word: Christ's commission, John xvi. to xx.; and Matthew's apostleship all stand or fall together! Amen.

"The Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, (is he) of whom the whole family (all fatherhood) in heaven and earth is named, Eph. iii. 15.

Hence, if one omits this supernal Name from Matt. xxviii. 19, 20; another may, (on a like presumption) omit the the name of "the Son!" Its integrity is alike involved.

All such adding to, Rev. xxii. 18, 19, seems alike irreverent and subversive of faith. But in love and earnest prayer for "the unity of the faith and the knowledge of the Son of God," I respond so far to correspondents, as in duty bound.

Editor Restitution:

I will once more try to write at least a short letter for THE RESTITUTION. Sometime last summer—a year ago—I wrote a short letter for the paper, but as we did not receive THE RESTITUTION I did not know as it had been received. I left home May 1, 1884, and reached home again November 19, 1885. I spent nearly all that time in Eastern Washington Territory—the greater part of the time at and near Badger, Douglass county, in what is known as the "Big Bend" of the Columbia. I did considerable preaching at Badger and generally had fair attendance, for a sparsely settled country. I visited Spokane Falls twice, and was in that vicinity altogether about three months. While there I preached on five-mile prairie, generally on Sunday. Made my home while there with Bro. J. F. Strong and his brother A. W. Strong, and their interesting families. They were formerly residents of Yolo county, California. They are pleasantly situated. I do not know how much may result from the preaching. I however believe the labor will not be lost.

I should not have remained so long at Badger, only for the reason that in September, 1884, I bought a squatter's claim on 160 acres of land, that was not in market, but was expected to be very soon. I remained there and have made considerable improvements which I cannot afford to lose—and the land is not yet on the market. As I had a right to be off of the land six months, and had been from my family so long, I resolved to go to my old home at Healdsburg and remain this winter. I must, however, be on the place again within the six months, or some one may jump the claim, and I will not only lose it, but what I have expended. I went there chiefly on account of asthma; and I was rid of it, and had the best of health during the whole time, I regard that as a very healthful climate, and the winters are not so unpleasant as in Indiana—if last winter was a fair specimen. The farm land is rich prairie and, but a small percentage taken up, and the land in that county is in market except four townships. The country is settling rapidly, and soon the choice places will be taken. I do not advise people to go there, for there are more privations than in older settled localities. There are good opportunities for getting homes very cheaply, however.

At Portland, Oregon, I took passage on the steamship G. W. Elder, which left there at 6 a. m. November 14, bound for San Francisco. We got along quite pleasantly until noon on the 17th, when a cyclone, or tornado, met us from the southeast, which struck the ship with terrific force. When the captain saw the storm in the distance he gave orders for reefing the sails, which was quickly done. In a few minutes huge billows were rolling, the air was filled with spray, and the sea covered with foam, presenting the appearance of a rough country covered with snow all in motion. The ship soon began rearing, plunging and rolling from side to side in the great troughs. In less than half an hour some of the billows would roll entirely over the hurricane deck; and at one time there was such a weight of water on the vessel that part of the upper skylight was broken. The passengers were by this time nearly all sick, and by the rolling of the vessel we could not keep our seats. Sometimes there were more than a dozen persons—men, women and children—tumbling and rolling on the cabin floor.

I cannot describe the scene which lasted more than six hours. I will give a brief outline: When the boat would make a grand apparent leap, or run on one side longer than usual, the screaming of women, children, and some men, was almost deafening. Some were crying, as if their hearts would break—abusing themselves because they had ventured from land. Others were praying, some were cursing, some were apparently indifferent as to results. I was once thrown from my seat on the floor, but seizing hold of a piano held there for a time. I could [illegible] they wanted to pray, but did not know what to say. I have never before been where an abiding faith in, and reliance upon, God was so necessary to rely on. There were but few in that company of about 170 who had thought much about relying upon God. During four hours of the storm the captain reported that we only gained one mile, the wind and force of the water so equally ballancing the power of the steam. There is a storm in the future; are we prepared for it? The ship was an iron one—but it sprang a leak. Pumps kept the water down. For several hours, I with the others thought we would all go to the bottom of the sea. But I knew it was promised the "sea shall give up the dead." I was not sea-sick.

While at Badger, when not on my place I made my home with my son Platt M. Corbaley and family. He is engaged in stock raising—both horses and cattle. My youngest son, Alvaro L. Corbaley, is also there, he too is turning his attention to raising stock. They are also improving their farms, having selected good locations. Their address is Badger, Douglass county, Washington Territory.

We hope to organize a little congregation there next spring. I preached the first discourse in that county, and solemnized the first marriage.

I will try to find some subscribers soon. As ever in hope.

MY CROSS.

It is not heavy, agonizing woe,
Bearing me down with hopeless, crushing weight,
No ray of comfort in the gathering gloom,
A heart bereaved, a household desolate;

It is not sickness, with her withering hand,
Keeping me low upon a couch of pain
Longing each morning for the weary night,
At night, for weary day to come again.

It is not poverty, with chilling blast,
The sunken eye, the hunger-wasted form;
The dear ones perishing for lack of bread,
With no safe shelter from the winter's storm.

It is not slander, with her evil tongue;
'Tis not "presumptuous sin" against my God;
Not reputation lost, or friends betrayed;
That such is not my cross I thank thee, Lord.

Mine is a daily cross of petty cares,
Of little duties pressing on my heart,
Of little troubles hard to reconcile,
Of inward struggles, overcome in part.

My feet are weary in their daily rounds,
My heart is weary of its daily care,
My sinful nature often doth rebel:
I pray for grace my daily cross to bear.

It is not heavy Lord, yet oft I pine;
It is not heavy, but 'tis ever here;
By day and night each hour my cross I bear
I dare not lay it down; Thou bidst it not.

I would not lay it down. I only ask
That, rising up my daily cross, I may
Follow my Master, humbly, step by step,
Through clouds of darkness, onto perfect day.

Worshiping the Shades of Our Dead Ancestors, and Distributing the Funeral Baked Meats.

"Ye shall have no other gods before me." "Ye shall worship the Lord your God (or your God as Lord) and him only shalt ye serve." "Remember that the Lord your God is one Lord." "In authority was the word." "In authority God created the heavens and the earth."

"And when I began to speak (the word understood) the Holy (sanctified) Spirit fell upon them even as upon us in authority" or authoritatively.

Yes, and I think the same result will follow the speaking of the word today. "For the promise is unto us and our children even as many as are afar off."

"Preach (herald not theorise) the word. Have exact knowledge (of it) in season and out of season (or when the opportunity seems favorable and when unfavorable, convince, reprove, exhort or help) with all forbearance [illegible] instruction."

[illegible] when they will not endure healthful teaching, but having an itching to hear, they will heap up teachers according to their own inordinate desires."

"And will turn away their hearing from the truth and will be turned away unto the myths."

But do thou be in every respect watchfully-do an evangelist's (an announcer of good tidings) work.

Make thy service one of full measure.

"For I am already poured (as a libation upon a sacrifice) and the appointed time (season) for my dissolution (what becomes of the wine when it is poured upon the sacrifice?) hath arrived."

"I have striven the good strife, I have finished (the word for perfect, elsewhere) the race (the race of life), I have watched to keep the faith. For the rest (of time understood or a certain period of it) the garland (the meed of victory; not the crown of rule, here) of righteousness is laid away for me; which the Lord, the just Judge, will give me on that day, and not me alone, but all those also who love his appearing (epiphany)."

"And there are gods (dispensers) many and lords (those who rule) many but for us (Christians) there is One God, of whom and for whom are all things, and One Lord, through whom are all things, and we through him."

"One faith, one baptism," in order that "renewed by the renewing of our minds, we may come to think the same thing in our relations to one another, that we may have the same thoughtful purpose" that was in Christ Jesus even, who though a god in form did not presume to be on terms of equality with God; but made naught (his emptied) of himself, having resolved a bond-servant's form, having come to pass (been born, elsewhere) in a likeness of men, "that we may not be haughty and selfish toward our brother in his matter, because the Lord is a requiter for all these things, even as we have foretold you, and gone through the testimony thereto."

"For God hath not called us to uncleanness but in sanctification."

"That being truthful in love we may grow into him in every respect, who is the head, namely, the Christ," the Anointed Head. "That we may reach adult manhood, a measure of the fullness of the Christ's adult age." "That we may no longer be children tossed to and fro like waves, and borne about by every little wind of teaching, in the deceiving play of men, in subtlety according to the method of their error."

"Let no one therefore, judge you in eating or drinking, or your part in a religious public observance (passover here meant no doubt) or a new moon, or Sabbatic observances, which (observances) are a shadow of the things to be, the body indeed being the Christ's. Let no one desiring in humility and false worship of the angels rashly entering into things which he hath not seen, puffed up with the mind of his flesh, deceitfully arbitrate away your prize."

"See to it that no one syllogize you through their philosophy and vain deceit, according to the tradition of men, according to the fundamental teachings of the cosmos and not according to Christ.

Because in him dwelleth all the fullness of the divine nature in a bodily form, and ye are made complete in him, who is the head of all authority and official power."

"In whom and with whom ye have been awakened to life through your faith in the inworking power of God, who awoke him from among the dead, and who along with him hath made you alive who were dead in your errors and the uncircumcision of your flesh, having shown himself gracious toward all our errors."

"For the grace of God hath appeared a saving grace to all men, instructing us, that those who have denied their irreverence and the inordinate desires of this cosmos, should live soberly and in a right and truly reverent way in their present lifetime, looking expectantly for the hope and manifestation of the glory of the Great God and of our Savior Jesus Christ; who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all transgression, and might purify for himself a superior royal people zealous for good works.

These things speak plainly and enjoin with exhortation and convincing proof."

This instruction was given to a young man who was to become a herald (preacher) of God's truth. Compare it with much of the preaching that you and I have listened to, my brother, for the last forty years in this land of liberty and great opportunity. Do not merely run your eye over what has been written thus far; for it is Scripture and God's word. Read it carefully, and compare it thoughtfully with a great deal that you have been told is God's word. Compare it with the flights of fancy and "vain imaginations" you have so often listened to. Try it by the standard of your common sense, your God-given reason. Does it not sound and read right? Is it not reasonable?

But you are beginning to say, What do you mean by your caption? I mean just the opposite of this preaching and faith, unreason, "wicked suppositions" and nonsense. The world is full of it, and always has been, and the church has been drawn into its maelstrom. The prevailing ideas of immortality and God's kingdom as preached in the Catholic and Protestant churches of today, are far more heathenish than Christian in their origin, and are very largely permeated in their terminology and teaching with a subtle form of the old heathenish Baal-worship. Most of the feast-days and fast-days are perpetuations of old heathen religious festivals, and the worship of saints in the Catholic Church is but one of the early compromises of the apostate Christian Church with the almost universally prevailing belief and practice in Baalism, of worshiping the shades or ghosts of dead ancestors; birth-days being occasions of special significance in both a private and public way of observing these heathen rites, when the worshipers decked the graves and memorial tombs of their ancestors with flowers and offerings of various sorts, prominent among which were the baked meats and other kinds of food of which the living partook at these private or public festivities.

For proof of this see Isaiah, Jeremiah and other writings of the prophets and Matthew's and Mark's account of Herod's birthday celebration in Christ's day, at which time "John the Baptizer" met his fate as a martyr and became a votive offering to Herod's Baal-worship and rash vow, his head being offered to the "ghosts" or the "shades" of Herod's dead ancestors, on (not a "charger") but a "votive tablet" or large wooden dish such as was used for setting out the votive offerings upon the tombs.

Read the account in the light of these ideas, my brother, which may be new to you, and see in this new light, what a demonish, hateful thing idolatry is. Observe how subtle its deception is, even in concealing the very facts of its iniquity by a perversion of the sacred record. How many of you knew before you read this, that Herod, on occasion of his beheading John, was engaged in the demoniac orgies of heathen Baal-worship, and that this was a common way of observing birthdays in those times? And yet it is all in the record, but untranslated or mistranslated.

What does Paul say of becoming "partakers of the tables of demons?" Is it consistent with being at the same time "partakers of the Lord's table" and the true votive offering?

The Baal-worship of today is very subtle, but it is no less Baal-worship. "The baked meats" of false worship are constantly being distributed before your eyes today, and the worship of dead ancestors as well as a reverent regard for their "ghosts" still prevails in every so-called Christian community. Christ has indeed ascended on high to distribute gifts—spiritual gifts—but not of this kind. We have, or may have, if we are what we ought to be, a distribution of Sanctified (Holy) Spirit; but this is unsanctified spirit, and its fruits even show it to be so.

Open your eyes and see. "By their fruits shall ye know them."

What are the fruits of the Spirit? Are they strife, heresy (sectarianism) Christ-division, following after Peter, Paul, Apollos? "Is Christ divided" so far as his head-ship is concerned? Is it not the authority and official power God conferred upon him? Is it self-conferred? What does it consist of? Is he not our "prophet, priest and king?" How did he prove his official qualification for his official work? Did he not fulfil the tests of the law and do what Moses said the Christ must do in order to qualify for his office? Did not his enemies even, and "the mixed multitude" confess this fact? "He speaks as one having official qualification, and not as the scribes." Read the Roman centurion's testimony. What does he say? I too am under "official power." But I have official power in my sphere, and I say to this soldier, Go, and he goeth, and, Come, and he cometh. Did that make the Roman centurion Cæsar? Does the authority and official qualification of Christ by God make Christ God? Read Christ's own testimony in John on this question.

"If ye do not believe me believe the works. For no man (more man without this official qualification as prophet) could do these things." In short, Christ's wonderful works (commonly called miracles) were for us the promised evidences, God's promised evidences under his covenant confirmed with an oath, of the Christ's official qualification under the authority God had conferred upon him.

Read the testimony to this in Hebrews, especially on the subject of his appointment and qualification for the High Priestly office, Chap. v. 1–6, inclusive, where his appointment to this office is compared and contrasted with God's appointment and call of Aaron. Did this call and appointment of Aaron by God make Aaron God?

Has God ever given and does he say that he will ever give his own intrinsic glory to another? Is there any intimation in God's word that he ever purposes to abdicate his throne? "Is God being mocked?" "Do men gather grapes of thistles, or figs of thorns?" Does a promised exaltation and conferred participation in the divine nature confer personality? Does the fact of my having human nature in common with the President of the United States make me Grover Cleveland?

We enlightened Gentiles look with wonder at the blindness of the Jew. What is their blindness to such blindness as this? What is their folly to such supreme folly as this? What "vain imagination" is to be compared with the vain and fantastic imaginations of Gentile theology? It asks one to believe not only that men can gather grapes of thistles or figs of thorns, that wolves are not wolves because they wear sheep's clothing, that black is white and white is black, that one is two and two is one, that personality can be divided and distributed around, and poured and sprinkled, and diffused and "presto change," appear again, person or personality at the magic call of its philosophical terminology, that a period of time is a material world, and a material world a period of time; that time is space, and space time; that nothing can be added to, subtracted from, multiplied or divided, and something be the result; that a will of one person is the same thing in substance as a covenant between two or more persons, that judgment and condemnation are identical terms; that natural life can be assumed as a first premise, and immortality drawn as a logical conclusion.

"The soul that sinneth it shall die," by a "presto change" argument interpreted to mean, shall not die, But live in eternal hellfire torment; soul according to this hypothesis being not an entity or "ghost" as before assumed, but a tangible, sentient organism of some sort, but indestructible and immortal, and therefore incapable of being destroyed or eliminated utterly even by its Creator.

But what saith the Scripture on this point? "Shall the created thing say to its Creator, or the moulded thing to the One who moulded it, Why didst thou make me thus?"

What becomes of the potter's vessel that is marred in the making, and never completed or perfected? Does it not go back to the "lump" or "mixture" from whence it was taken? Has not the potter a right to, and does he not in fact make one vessel for honor and another for dishonor, and does not each vessel, whether designed for an honorable or debased use, subserve the end for which it was made by the potter?

Does God not say to "the man after his own heart," "I know you whom you were in the constituent parts of the earth?" and does he not say to another not after his own heart, "For this very purpose I raised thee up?" And did they not both glorify their Maker in fulfilling the purpose for which they were made or "raised up?"

The science or false philosophy of the present day, catching at a word which the average intelligence is unfamiliar with, tells you that man originated from "protoplasm," meaning by this statement that man had his origin in a self-germinating germ. To say nothing of the absurdity of this concept, as a pure hypothesis, what an infelicitous choice of a term to express it! for the term protoplasm is merely the Greek word protoplasma (πρωτόπλασμα) Anglicised, and means "first-moulded," the very farthest possible expression from the idea of self-creation or spontaneous generation.

But this is one of "the baked meats" that has been widely distributed of late and which modern intelligence is complacently feeding upon, while they build "memorial tombs" and worship the shades (or ghosts) of their dead ancestors.

Jewish and Gentile Artisans in the Holy Land.

When the children of Israel were masters of Palestine, they carried on every description of trade and handicraft. Most of them were tillers of the soil, and agriculture was as honorable a calling for a free man as it was amongst the ancient Romans; but whereas among these, the same as among the Greeks, most other descriptions of labor were only thought fit for slaves, the Jews, especially in the age of the Second Temple, were not ashamed to work at any trade, and some of their greatest men made quite as good a mark in their handicrafts as they did in Hebrew literature.

The case is vastly different at the present day in Palestine. There is a very large Jewish population in that country, mostly consisting of immigrants from Russia and Poland, and a very much smaller number of Gentiles from Europe. The Jews, who are originally indigenous to the soil, enjoy a great many advantages which the Gentiles lack altogether, yet in the battle of life the majority are, according to their own admission, very generally beaten by the minority. This is more especially the case in everything pertaining to skilled labor. A very interesting paper on the subject, written by an inhabitant of Jerusalem called Jechiel Michel Pines, has lately been published in the Jewish paper Hamebee, and we extract from this paper the following data relating to the differences existing between the two classes of handicraftsman:—

"As far back as sixty years ago, some of our brethren had settled here as tradesmen. There were to be found among them goldsmiths, watchmakers, die-sinkers, stonemasons, joiners, blacksmiths, coppersmiths, bookbinders, carpenters, tailors, shoemakers, carpet-weavers, etc. But, strange to say, not one of these got so far as to build a house of his own at Jerusalem. The local conditions cannot be held accountable for this, for we have seen with our own eyes that some German artisans, belonging to the body of Templars, settled down here as tradesmen, and in a comparatively short time got on exceedingly well. The first blacksmith who settled in Jerusalem was a Jew, called Elia Solomon; he was clever and industrious, yet he remained poor. The German blacksmiths, on the contrary, have each of them a flourishing business. The first olive wood workers were Jews; they did not get on at all. Then came a Gentile from Germany, called Pester. That man has made quite a fortune, and the work he turns out is much in demand throughout Europe and America. Again, the first men who started steam-mills here were Jews, but somehow or other they did not succeed. Now there are six steam flour mills at Jerusalem, and not one of them is in Jewish hands. The first stonecutter was a Jew, he was very clever, and his work was even appreciated by the emperor Francis Joseph, but he remained poor, whilst a Christian from Germany has stolen a march on him, set up a workshop and made a lot of money.

"Some will have it that the German artisans get on so well because they meet with support abroad But this is by no means the case. The Templars' are entirely dependent on themselves and on their Association, and even this association as a body attends only to the appointment of teachers, doctors, etc. They are really quite self-supporting, while the Jews have always the chalukah to fall back on, an eleemosynary fund, from which many Jewish families used to derive their entire support, and which even at this day defrays a large proportion of the help of a great many Jewish inhabitants of the Holy City. The fact of the matter is that this fund has really stood in the way of our brethren becoming self-supporting, despite all the good it has done to the poor among them.

"The question arises, What are the real causes of the defeat experienced by the Jewish artisans in entering the lists with natives of Germany? The manifest superiority of our brethren in the field of industry, as far as commercial success is concerned, may be traced to four causes. In the first place, a German tradesman is neither afraid of competition, where it exists, nor does he show himself unduly independent when he has no competition to contend with. The Jew, on the contrary, puts extortionate prices on his articles when there is no rival shop in the field, whilst, when he is met by much competition, he soon loses courage, throws up the sponge and almost gives away his goods. In the second place, the German artisan goes more systematically to work. Before he comes here, he makes his plans, he knows exactly what he requires, and he manages to promise everything in proper market. The Jewish artisan, on the contrary, leaves a great many things to chance. He looks now one thing and now another, and being obliged to get these things at haphazard, he often has to pay double or treble the value of them. Besides, he keeps chopping and changing about, and never sticks to one specialty; all that goes dead against him.

"The next point is, that the German artisan brings a stock of patience and endurance with him which our brethren are deficient of. He does not despair directly his business gets slack. The Jew loses courage at once, when the flow of customers slackens; his spirits droop, and lacking energy, he does but little work. The last and most important point is the difference in the organization of charity. If a Gentile from Germany gets into distress, his brethren help him, but don't make a beggar of him. They have no such thing as a chalukah fund. By way of charity, they give him goods to sell, but not for nothing, for he has to account for every penny he gets out of them. He never loses his self-respect nor his self-dependence. The support he gets is in the shape of loans and not of gifts. How very different is this Christian organization of charity by the side of ours? The chalukah fund is made up of contributions collected amongst our brethren abroad, who simply put their hands into their pockets, but never enquire what becomes of the money, so long as they can lay the flattering unction to their souls that they have done some good. Let there be an end of this system of mendicity, say I; if you want to help, render people self-dependent, and don't make professional mendicants of them."

The foregoing extracts would not be complete without a few words respecting the "Templars" repeatedly mentioned therein. This is an association of natives of Germany, Protestants to a man, who have settled in various parts of Palestine and formed flourishing colonies there. They carry on their works very much on the same lines as the Pilgrim Fathers did after settling on the continent of America some two hundred years ago. They mean to promote Evangelical Christianity in the Holy Land, while spreading there at the same time the benefits of European civilization, of which that country still stands in need. In doing so they encounter an immense amount of hostility on the part of the Romanists, more especially on the part of the monks who have been settled there for a great many years. The great energy which the Templars bring to bear on everything they take in hand, greatly clashes with the life of idleness led by the monks.—Prophetic News, and Israel's Watchman.

THE EASTERN QUESTION AND PROPHECY.

The present re-opening of the Eastern Question, supposed by many to have been settled for a generation at least at the Berlin Conference seven years ago, may be a surprise to those who think that sovereigns and statesmen are the makers of history, but not to those who recognize that the Most High ruleth in the kingdoms of men.

Twenty-five centuries ago God made known to Daniel the period during which Moslem power was to endure, and that period, reckoned from the Mohammedan capture of Jerusalem, closes in four years from the present date. Western Europe may band itself together to uphold the independence of the Ottoman Porte as much as it will; it may conclude treaty after treaty with that end in view, but all its attempts are and will be in vain; for the purposes of God must stand, and inspired prophecy assures us that his purpose is that the Ottoman power in Palestine shall cease, and that, if our interpretation be correct, before the close of this decade.

Is this a rash, presumptuous statement? For three centuries before the end of the temporal power of the Papacy students of prophecy had understood from Scripture, and stated in their expository works, that it would terminate between A. D. 1866 and 1870, as it actually did. The same system of interpretation thus verified by history leads now to the conclusion above stated, that the end of Mohammedan power in Syria is close at hand. The present reopening of the Eastern Question may be, and probably is, the beginning of the end, the commencement of the last stage of the long struggle. A further brief postponement of the inevitable may possibly happen, but if it does, the reprieve will be even shorter than that secured by the Berlin Treaty; for there is little room to doubt that A. D. 1880 will witness the complete collapse of Mohammedan power, at any rate in Syria. A statement of the grounds on which this conclusion is based will doubtless prove interesting at this crisis. I will endeavor to give as brief a one as I can, divested of extraneous matter, however strongly corroborative.

Bases of interpretation. And first I must be allowed to recall a few unquestioned Biblical, historic and astronomic facts.

(1). The final restoration of God's people, the Jews, is as largely predicted as is their present dispersion in countless passages of Scripture, such as "He that scattered Israel will gather him." (See also Isa. xi. 11, 16).

(2). Connected with the restoration of the people of Israel is a promise of deliverance of their land from Gentile oppression, and of Jerusalem itself and the temple site from subjection to aliens.

(3). Since the time of its destruction by Titus, Jerusalem has been desolated and Palestine oppressed by two great Gentile Powers, and by two only, the Roman and Mohammedan. The latter has trodden down Jerusalem in its two successive forms, Saracenic and Ottoman, or Turkish. Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans in A. D. 70, conquered by the Saracens in A. D. 637, and is trodden down by the Turks to this day.

(4) In Dan. xii. 7, 11 chronological limits are assigned to the desolations of Jerusalem. Their duration is fixed by the expression "1260 days."

(5) Nature measures years of different lengths, and the proportion of the solar year to the lunar year is such that 1260 lunar are 1222½ solar; while 1260 lunar years are 1251½ solar.

(6) The original destruction of Solomon's Temple, and the overthrow of Jerusalem in the reign of Zedekiah, took place in the nineteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar, B. C. 587, after a series of victorious attacks on the city, and deportations of Jews to Babylon, extending over the twenty previous years, during the first of which Daniel himself was carried captive.

(7). The Saracenic conquest of Jerusalem, in A. D. 637, was the closing incident of a series of most remarkable campaigns, extending over four years, in the course of which the whole of Northern Syria and Palestine proper fell before the fanatical Moslem hordes, under the leadership of Caled, who was called "the sword of God." Damascus fell first, and a great victory was gained over the imperial army of the Eastern Empire at the battle of Ais-Nadin, July, A. D. 633. From the conquest of Damascus the Saracens advanced on that of Emesa and Hamah. The subjugation of the plain and vale of Syria occupied two years, A. D. 634-5; the battle of Yermuk, near the Springs of Hermon, in which the Saracens overthrew the great army sent to defend his Syrian Provinces by Heraclius, the Eastern Roman Emperor, took place in A. D. 636; and then, in the following year, the Seige of Jerusalem commenced, and lasted four months. It yielded at length to the besiegers, and the Caliph Omar, who founded the mosque which bears his name, and still occupies the site of Solomon's Temple, entered the city after having signed the capitulation.

The four years of Mohammedan conquest in Syria, 633 to 637, correspond in duration and character with the four years of the Roman war, which ended with Titus's capture of Jerusalem A. D. 66 to 70. By the Romans the daily sacrifice was taken away; by the Mohammedans the desolation of Jerusalem was completed. The years 633 to 637 witnessed the full establishment in Palestine and in Jerusalem of the final desolating power, the power which still treads down the city of the Great King.

(8). The year A. D. 1860 was a remarkable year in the history of the Jews and of their country. It was the year of the horrible Druze massacre of the Christians in the Lebanon and at Damascus. That massacre was connived at, if not planned, by the Turkish Government. The remonstrances of the European Consuls in the country were treated with neglect and contempt. The Christians were disarmed by the authorities, and left like defenceless sheep to be butchered by their bloodthirsty enemies the Druzes. Thousands of innocent lives and millions of property were sacrificed, and the total apathy and the incompetence of the Turkish Government to maintain order was such that the Great Powers of Europe intervened. Syria was occupied by French troops, and an English fleet anchored at Beyrout. The result was the conclusion of the treaty by which Northern Syria was placed under a Christian governor, and the welfare of its inhabitants secured by a restraction of the Turkish power, insisted upon by European compulsion. The year, in short, witnessed a marked though partial deliverance of the Holy Land from Mohammedan oppression; it witnessed the turn of the tide. The condition of Palestine and Syria has ever since been improving, and the contrast of what they are today and what they were twenty-five years ago is remarkable.

The year 1860 also witnessed the foundation of "The Universal Israelite Alliance," an organization which has now reached its twenty-fifth anniversary, and has reconstituted the Jews, scattered throughout the world into an organized body, for the first time since their dispersion in the days of Titus. It is a patriotic association for the help and protection of the Jewish people, its aim being to secure in every country Jewish emancipation and liberty, and the intellectual and moral regeneration of the people. It is an alliance which now has branches not only in every nation, but almost in every city and town in which Jews are resident; and it has given to the scattered people a sense of unity and mutual help to which for long centuries they had been strangers.

It has connected with it numerous schools and educational establishment, especially an agricultural school in Palestine itself, founded under a conviction that only by inducing them to turn their attention to agriculture could the Jews in Palestine be benefited. In 1870 it obtained an imperial firman, by which the Porte leased to it, for an indefinite period, a splendid piece of land in the neighborhood of Jaffa, where an agricultural establishment was founded. Twenty-five thousand vine-trees were planted, and gardens, farm buildings, orange, lemon, and pomegranate plantations have sprung up around this school of practical agriculture, which trains Jewish youth for productive industry in the land of their fathers.

The importance of the Universal Israelite Alliance to the fortunes of the Jewish people cannot well be overestimated. Its head-quarters are in Paris, but its influence is felt and its beneficial action on behalf of the Jews exerted everywhere, from Persia to Morocco. The twenty-five years of its existence have been especially a period of renaissance to the seed of Abraham, who are once more possessed, by its means, of what the French call "solidarité."—H. Grattan Guinness, in Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

WAITING.

What wondrous ways hath God whereby
His faithfulness to testify!
Through what unnumbered channels pour
The streams from love's unfailing store!

Yet though "in Him all fulness dwells,"
The straitness of our heart rebels
Against that grace whose matchless plan
Transcends the highest thoughts of man.

A heavy burden on me lay,
And pressed me more each weary day;
I tried to "suffer and be strong,"
But sank, through sharp suspense and long.

At last, when hope had almost died,
From out my inmost heart I cried
"O lift the burden, Lord, I pray,
Before another Sabbath day."

The Sabbath came, and ere it went
A blessing to my soul was sent,
As far removed from that I sought
As heavenly from human thought.

'Twas neither voice nor written word
That brought relief from hope deferred,
But calmer spirit fell the balm
Of restful trust and sweetest calm.

The long, dim path was touched with light
That made the darkest places bright;
I was content his time to bide,
Within his shadow safely hid.

My heart's desire be still withheld,
But all its restless yearning quelled.
I could not find it hard to wait
So close to mercy's golden gate.

Permit me to say to the brethren scattered abroad that I am still in the field, and on the third Saturday in October, in company with Dr. S. S. Trubridge and my married daughter, Sarah E. Herod, we went to what is known as the Grady school house, in the north part of Neosho County, where brethren Grady, Hole, Johnson, S. Taylor, and a number of others live. There we heard the Doctor give us a good discourse on the three worlds, from our chart. House full of attentive listeners, well pleased with the discourse. On Sunday it rained all day. On Monday my daughter wanted to be baptised, so we went to the water; and there we buried her in the likeness of the burial of our blessed Master, and raised her up to walk in newness of life.

From there we went to Erie, to take our daughter home, only to return to the Grady school house to arrange for a discussion with Elder A. H. Scott; which discussion lasted eight nights, during which a great many people heard the truth. The balance I will leave for our worthy Doctor S. S. Trubridge to tell.

Well I will leave a space blank and go to Prescott, where I held a discussion several years ago with Elder Scott, two miles west of Prescott. I began a meeting on Saturday evening and continued until the next Friday evening. Baptised nine persons into Christ. This meeting began Nov. 7. On Friday evening we met, as the brethren were very anxious to organize, or rather re-organize. So we organized with Bro. Caleb Denney as Elder, and Bro. Nathan Lapsley as Deacon. I then gave them a discourse on practical Christianity, and what they must all do to make it easy on the Elder and Deacon, and what the Elder and Deacon must do in order to have a good and a lively church at that place, and then left them in the hands of an allwise God, and a crooked and perverse generation to contend with besides. If they will continue to live right they will come off more than conquerors.

After we had sung a parting hymn, Bro. Kimsey dismissed the congregation, and we left for Prescott, with Bro. Miller and family. Nov. 14, we started for Pleasanton. Preached Saturday evening, Sunday twice, and on Monday evening. Tuesday we baptised three ladies, two that had formerly been baptised in the Campbellite faith. After they heard the faith of Jesus they were baptised into the Christ of the Bible. After we had buried these three sisters by baptism, we in company with John and Isaac Searight and Bro. John O. Turner, left for Pleasanton to take the train for Parsons, Kan. On Wednesday I landed home, found all well. This trip reminded me of old times, that we used to have in Indiana and Kansas. Oh, if only we could all get waked up again as we used to be. Then Bro. Underwood would not have to beg so much for the brethren to do their duty.

Brethren why are you so slack, and do not pay up your dues for THE RESTITUTION? Even if you should have to stop chewing tobacco for one year, it would do you good. I have no doubt you would quit for good then, as you well know the weed is injuring your health, and is robbing your family. Some of the brethren say there is a dun in the paper ever since the paper comes. Well do you ever hear to stop that dun? Yes. Well then if you pay in advance and then the dun wont reach you at all, and Bro. Underwood and our worthy Editor will be happy.

Now, dear brethren let us all do our duty. For I have been made sad in the last month more than a dozen times. Tell us how, why by going and visiting old Brethren that had been in the faith many years. I find on their tables lots of political papers, but no religious papers, no RESTITUTION, no nothing of the kind. All carried away in politics. What a state our brethren are in. It is no wonder that the man that goes out to preach has that to do at his own expense, or leave it undone.

Well brethren there are a few good Christian brethren scattered here and there, that keep me at work part of the time. But if there ever was a time that preaching was a necessity it is now. Brother, what thou doest do quickly. A few more years at most will tell the story. Jesus soon is coming, this is my song. I tell this same old story wherever I go. And oh, that he would only come and find us ready, waiting and watching when he does come. It seems that the true faith is too dead, or at least those that claim to have the true faith. It is too much form and too little practice.

Yours in the hope of the soon coming Kingdom.

I would like to say to the brethren and sisters scattered abroad, Be steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; forasmuch as you know that your labor will not be in vain in the Lord. Knowing he is faithful who has promised, knowing also that in due season you will reap if you faint not. Remember, the just shall live by faith. Do not neglect to watch and pray. Jesus said, Watch and pray always, that you may be counted worthy to escape those things that are coming on the earth, and to be permitted to hear Jesus say, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.

O how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation, which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him. Paul says, Neglect not the assembling of yourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhort one another, and so much the more as you see the day approaching. Remember that whatsoever we sow we shall reap. O, that we may sow to the Spirit, that we may reap life everlasting. Yours in hope.

Enclosed please find two dollars for the renewal of my paper for six months, and to send to the address of some one you might think of. I have been hoping I might hear from some one who might take the paper but will not wait longer. I could not exist very long without the comfort it brings to a lonely heart. Religion is at a low ebb, or faith in the Bible around us. The signs are multiplying every day of the end.

My health is improving, and I am hoping to do something for the precious cause of Christ. Hoping to write oftener for our beloved paper, and do more in the way of getting subscriptions for it. Praying for your continuance in health, I am your Sister in Christ.

We are connected with Eureka, the County seat, by railroad, water communication and also by stage line around the Bay. At Eureka the steamers sail for San Francisco and other points. We are all well thanks be to God for his favors shown to us, unworthy though we are. The weather is clear and pleasant and feel is getting abundant. Stock looks well, and business is fair so far. ## Fannie Crosby's Christmas Letter to the Children.

Happy children, Sunday-scholars,
In your favored Christian land—
How I wish, for just a moment,
I could clasp each tiny hand!
But that pleasure is denied me,
For you live too far away;
So I send my yearly greeting
On this merry Christmas-day.

I have prayed that heavenly blessings
On your head, like dew, might fall.
Oh, I have a heart, dear children,
Large enough to hold you all!
And its wealth of love divided
Gives to each a goodly share;
I will call my heart a casket,
You the gems that sparkle there.

I am thinking of a story,
That you all remember well—
Of a little helpless baby,
Jesus came on earth to dwell;
How an angel told the shepherds,
While a chorus in the sky
Sang good-will to men for ever,
"Glory be to God on High!"

With those festive hours returning,
Let us lift our souls above!
Let us thank our kind Redeemer
For his rich and boundless love.
I am sure you all are grateful,
And I hope, my children dear,
You will have a merry Christmas
And a cloudless, bright New-Year.

Power of Temptation.

I know of a man who was a temperance lecturer. In his early years he had been a great drunkard: but he was reformed, and had got considerable notoriety as a platform speaker in one of our large cities. By trade he was a glass cutter. One day, many years after he had been a confirmed Christian, as every one thought, a servant girl brought into his place of business a decanter, with a broken neck, and asked him to cut it smooth. He took up the bottle to see what was wrong; the fumes of brandy came out of the neck and went into his brain. He turned the decanter upside down and got a drop of the liquid upon his finger. He put it to his lips. It set his blood on fire. He went to the nearest public-house and got drunk. That was the beginning of a very bitter and disgraceful end.—Prof. Drummond.

The Miner's Daughter.

One cold winter, when the ground was so covered with snow that the little birds could not find anything to eat, the little daughter of a miserly rich man gathered up all the crumbs she could find, and was going to carry them out and scatter them on the snow.

Her father saw her, and asked her what she was going to do. She told him, and he said, "What good will it do? The crumbs will not be enough to feed one in a hundred of the birds."

"I know it, dear father," said she, "but I shall be glad to save even one in a hundred of them if I cannot save them all."

The father thought a moment. He knew that many poor persons were suffering in the village, and he had refused to help any, because he could not help them all. His conscience struck him, and he told his little daughter to break a loaf of bread into crumbs for the birds, while he went to scatter loaves among the poor villagers.

Failed and Succeeded.

Men admit that no one is equally great in all things. Yet they often do not see that a man's failure in one line of work is no reason why he may not succeed in a different calling.

An incident which occurred some years ago in a London linen store illustrates this blindness.

A young man, whose bluntness was such that he was of no use as a salesman, was told that he did not suit and must go. Seeking the head of the house the youth said:

"Don't turn me away; I am good for something."

"You are good for nothing as a salesman," replied the principal.

"I am sure I can be useful," continued the youth.

"How? Tell me how?"

"I don't know, sir; I don't know."

"Nor do I," said the principal, laughing at the boy's coolness and ignorance.

"Don't put me away," continued the youth; "try me at something else. I know I can't sell, but I can make myself useful somehow; I know I can."

Moved by his earnestness the principal placed him in the counting room. Immediately his aptitude for figures showed itself. In a few years he became the head cashier of the concern. Throughout the country he was known as an eminent accountant.

Why He was Never Late.

"How is it that you are never late at Sunday-school, Edwin?" I asked.

His Sunday-school began a quarter before nine in the morning, and I concluded many of the children found it hard to be prompt, as they came straggling in all through the opening service; Edwin, never; he was always in time.

"How is it Edwin?"

"Oh, I always plan to come," said Edwin. "I put the polish on my boots over night. I find my Bible and question-book, and place them in a safe corner beforehand. I brush and put on my Sunday clothes before breakfast. So after breakfast and prayers I start in time to get there before the superintendent rings the school to order."

"And you don't lag by the way?"

"Never!" said Edwin. "It is better to be five minutes too early than one minute too late."

Ah, boys, see how it helps one along to have a plan!

Christ's Return.

When he ascended into heaven two angels stood by the disciples on the Mount of Olives, and said:—"Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." That is the great hope of the Church—the return of the Redeemer; to welcome him our Lord and Savior. When is it to be? We have waited eighteen centuries and more, but shall we wait forever? No! It is the opinion of intelligent students of prophesy, that we are in the Saturday night of this dispensation, and that, perhaps, in less than fifty years, perhaps, in less than forty, perhaps much less, the sound of the great trump will be heard, and the blessed Master will return to gather his Church up to himself. And is he not preparing the world for it? Is not this work in the hearts, and souls, and bodies of men a preparation for this great event? Ay, I think it is, and there are many who think so, too. It is just as, before the sun rises in the morning, before its broad, shining disc is seen above the horizon, the beams of light begin to show themselves and light up the peaks of the mountain tops. These are indications of the coming of him we look for. In this precious work, he, the Sun of Righteousness, is shedding forth his beams, rising with healing in his wings.—D. D. Smith, Wilmington, Del.

The Christ of God.

He was the Son of man and the Son of God, and he seemed to lie as it were embosomed in the Father's arms, feeling as if around his path and about his soul, in darkest hours, in supremest moment, the Divine hands watched to guide and to bless. He felt at all times at home with God; He lived in God, God lived in him; men felt in his presence as in the presence of the Father, because in the presence of the only begotten Son. And note when he became religiously active, what he did, and where was he found! Not in the temple, but in the highway, where disease was to be cured; in the home where wisdom was to be taught; on the sea and by the shore, where men were prepared to listen; at the receipt of custom, or in the haunts of the outcast, where men are waiting to be saved; there bringing to lost men the great message of life, there he was found. And, high though he seemed, he gave to us man the sense that he condescended; great though he was he never had the sense of condescension. What he did was through the great and surest compulsion of a true and holy love. What God is among his worlds, Christ is among men. He was the minister of God to man, come to give his life a ransom for many. He was the great helper of the forlorn, the Savior who seized and uplifted the lowly, and carried on his own weary shoulders the burden of guilt that crushed men to the earth. And what feeling did he give them? A new strange feeling, making the men who were guilty feel a passion for good, changed the sense of sin to the outcast into the sense of being once the beloved of the Father and the Son.—A. M. Fairbairn, D. D.

THE COMING AGE,

—ITS—

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WESTERS.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among reflecting people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the facts of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

MICAWBER NOTES.

Not knowing, of a certainty, that a single reader of THE RESTITUTION [illegible] for sundry sins [illegible] at last, [illegible] such an assurance, I suppose I have suffered my pen to lie more than ordinarily idle. And now with a speck of slowness and hesitation, I resume it for the once, again. True enough it is, there is power in a bit of encouragement, but without it, one's ink is a drop, and pen rags, at times. However, this not by way of complaint. Yet, there is this thought suggested, and I ought to remember it on behalf of many who are isolated, sad, poor, and almost bereft friends with adversity; this thought I say, that we who have time and opportunity, may do much good with timely and sympathizing letters. There is nobody on earth, except the overworked men of office, and business, but feels a gladness in the receipt of letters, particularly such as show thoughtfulness, friendship, sympathy and neighborly interest. I repeat it, good people, men and women, brethren and sisters, who have good dispositions and kind hearts, who are pitiful and thoughtful, and who wish to be better and do better yourselves—how much good you may do, with sensible and seasonable letters! Letters with a trace of feeling—not coldly intellectual, not merely or only doctrinal and theological, but alive with generous and kindly suggestions, and pulsations of goodwill. How much good it does one, in this naughty world, to see or read, or hear, any mention or token, or signal that seems to say or to him, those three little words, I love you. We may have piles and piles of good ideas, and wise teachings, but here is the truest orthodoxy. We may learn a lesson from the good new that lifts her new-born self into nice blessed confidence and the delights of living. I can see at once, and see with wonder at the neglect of such a powerful way and means of doing good—how almost untold good, thousands and millions of people may do, by timely letters, wise, but friendly—say, wise because they are friendly—not letters of frivolous and empty nothings, nor gyrate of merely pious formalities, and discussions of topics that are not warming in their influence, though these are well enough in their place. But many a poor soul is saddened and helped by hearing that somebody in the world cares for a fellow-mortal, burdened and weary, one way or another. Many people get an oppressive feeling of dullness partly from the perpetual routine, and unbroken monotony of things. A cheery salutation, a hearty hand shake, even figuratively, by mail, does no little good. One, with a grand stock of good-nature and hopefulness, and faith, and a faculty of communicating himself to others, is a happy man, a blessed man, a help in the world. It is a good thing he was born. Make way for him. Take off your hat to him He is always in good time, always a helper, and a benefactor. And he has a good field to work in, a fine sphere to move in. For the majority of men and woman kind have some weight resting on the heart, some pressure on the brain, some mist before the eyes, some slowness, some trembling, some impediment. What a grand thing it is to have a heartache cured, to have a trouble healed, to have a darkness chased away! And what a grand thing it is to do it! And I am sorry there are so few that have found out just this last named thing.

Little children, we must do better, because we learn better. We must grow happy by doing more good, and do more good by distributing sunshine, and sending out sparks and flashes of good cheer. And I am sure God can help us do it. And think how much precious time we have lost by not stopping to think of some distant friend, in a far away land, or state, hungry for society, hungry for fellowship, longing to be remembered, or dreading to be forgotten. Many such a one might we have cheered with good words, costing not more than an hour, less or more, and not more than three cents cash, including paper, pen, ink, envelope and stamp, and worth three hundred times three cents to the neglected friend. I have sometimes dreamed that I have done a dreadful thing, and for which in my sleep I covered myself with [illegible] in letting my horse or [illegible] intended for many [illegible] at last, [illegible] to find the poor thing almost starved to death through my neglect! Think how easy it is for us to let some friend starve through remissness, starve for want of attention and affection. And if we will do good in life and time, do good while we have life, and sense, and will, and opportunity, do good before death takes away all suppleness, and obedience of muscles and members to the mind, obedience and great convenience and willingness of obedience of the muscles of the eyes and fingers, and the tongue itself, all these with all their magical possibilities—do good I say, while the sun shines and the heart beats—and the blood flows in an invisible unseen and never-pausing current of service and work, let us, among all other things, write letters, letters of good will, good cheer, and good sense! letters to whom letters are due, letters to whom letters will be a benison and even an inspiration. Is life short? Then we see what we are to do. Think you not there is some heart ache, that you have the power to touch and take away with the wand of a good word? Whose heart ache will you mend or mitigate, when you are dead, unless your words work genially after you? And now is the appointed and accepted time—when you are in health and in heart, and you have your two hands to do what your will by its edict commands.

I do not mean that you are not to teach, and invite and persuade, as well as console. You can do all these by letter. But you can save and bless sorrowful or weary people with words of encouragement. Encourage them to all good thoughts and things. Encourage them, even ingeniously if need be, but encourage with your soul in your words, the words of your fingers when you write. A little heart in what you say, gives a charm to wisdom—and while heart without sense, is little worth, it does wonderfully to make sense vital and powerful—and gives sweetness to all things. If you will win somebody to Christ, think over what you have left undone. Think whom you have neglected. And think what good words in good season, may do in God's hand, what wonders they can work, what new trains of thought they may set in motion, what new ways of looking at things, they may facilitate or stimulate, and what a new interest and hopefulness they may give to life. In this way, dear souls, you also with golden sense body, some breathing being like yourself, and make the world better for living in it, in this way, you can do something well and worthy and not lie down to die with the doleful sense, or crashing fear, that you have been a cypher in life, and let gold coins of precious moments, slip unused and useless through your fingers.

Wonderful is the industry, the patience, and the fidelity of the mail service of America, and even of the civilized world. You shoot a letter into the box, and it goes straight as an arrow to it work. This is one of God's mercies to us, almost one of his miracles. You say to the little postal card mercury, go, and he goeth, to the envelope with its ruby signal at the corner—"fly"—and away it goes on the wings of the wind. Ah, favored epoch of swift missives and transits of messages on wings. Whithersoever the sender wills! So then, the way is open, and the possibility simply splendid. Let us repent of past omissions not by tears merely, but by reparations—and by redemptions of time, and ready work of easily doing good, for by letters you may speak and not tremble with some childish trepidation or timidity. You may write with a curious joy of that sweet union of society and privacy, of spontaneousness and deliberation.

You may contribute to make some far off little Post Office bloom and brighten with some white flower of a communication. You may gladden many hearts in one group, with a greeting, with a good wish true and fresh from your very heart, and with all good hints, hits, helps, and the helpfulness of hopefulness and love. And if your far off friend is too poor to buy paper and stamps put a parcel of those handsome things that supremely govern routes, and that say "let me come, for it is my right," inside your letter, to prepay return letters, and if your will be liberal as God is to you, send paper by itself, send any thing, send money even, that answers all things, send yourself, in your little gifts, and in your greetings. And your gifts will be loans, that God the Watcher and Rewarder in heaven, will munificently repay. C. COLGROVE.

[For several reasons, not necessary to specify, we assure Bro. C. that his articles are highly appreciated and are more than welcome. Forgive—Write and write often.—ED. RES.]

Youth's Column.

Alabaster Boxes.

Do not fill with costly perfume
Alabaster boxes, white,
Hiding all love's precious ointment
Far away from mortal sight.

Do not keep your flowers for coffins;
They can cast no fragrance back
Over the weary life that's ended,
Over the lonely, cheerless track.

Do not save your kindest sayings,
Do not keep the tears unshed
Till the "silver cord is loosened,"
And the friend belated is dead.

Take the alabaster boxes,
Break them in your homes today,
Shed their purest and barely perfume
All along life's rugged way.

Break your flowers to friends while living,
Pluck the blossoms wet with dew,
They will whisper thoughts of gladness,
They will breathe of kindness true.

Sympathize with hearts of sadness,
Bid the fainting one be strong,
Stretch a hand to help the fallen,
Sing a cheering, helpful song.

—Ella H. Morton, in Visitor.

Home.

"Home!" Oh, how sweet is that word! What beautiful and tender associations cluster thickly around it! Compared with it, house, mansion, palace are cold, heartless terms. But "Home"—that word quickens the pulse, warms the heart, stirs the soul to its depths, makes age feel young again, rouses apathy into energy, sustains the sailor in the midnight watch, inspires the soldier with courage on the field of battle, and imparts patient endurance to the worn-down sons of toil. The thought of it has proved a sorrowful shield of virtue: the very name of it has been a spell to call back the wanderer from the paths of vice. And far away, where myrtles bloom and palm-trees wave, and the ocean sleeps upon coral strands, to the exile's fond fancy it clothes the naked rock, or stormy shore, or barren moor, or wild highland mountain, with charms he weeps to think of, and longs once more to see. Grace sanctifies these lovely affections, and imparts a sacredness to the homes of earth by making them types of heaven.—Dr. Guthrie.

Tell the Truth.

There are too many persons who sometimes find it convenient to "lie a little." The following incident in the life of General Grant is a severe rebuke to such persons.

An important conference was being held in the executive mansion in Washington. A caller had sent in his card, but either the caller was unwelcome or the time was quite unsuitable for his admission. One of the persons present turned to a servant and said:

"Tell the person who sent up the card that the President is not in."

"No," said General Grant, "tell him no such thing." Then, turning to his friends, the General remarked:

"I don't lie myself, and I don't want my servants to lie for me."

That was noble. If our boys want to copy the example of great men, let them pick out such things as this and follow them. Great men, as well as others, make mistakes. The mistakes they make are not any better or nearer right because they were made by great and leading men. We are not excusable for following great men into wrong-doing. We should copy their examples only when they do right. The example of Gen. Grant in reference to telling the truth is worthy of copying. His words with a little change, are worthy of being used as a motto: "I do not lie for myself and I don't want any one else to lie for me."—Messenger.

The Ministry of Insects.

It has been said by some naturalists that "insects pay liberal wages for the food which flowers provide for them." And you will surely think so when you know what a very important duty they are called upon to perform. This strange service is rendered mostly by the vast army of flies, bees, butterflies, and moths that are following out the great law of nature in their unconscious "mission of love."

The law of exchange is one of the most remarkable facts in history. First, flowers feeding the insects, and then the insects, becoming common "carriers" of the air, bearing fertilizing dust to them in return. In this way a marvellous inter-crossing of species is brought about, producing flowers of great variety and loveliness. The seeds of a flower are much stronger and better if the dust or pollen of one is carried and left on the knob or stigma of another, and the only way this can be done is by the insects flying from one flower to another, as they do, and carrying the dust on their legs and bodies. A drop of honey is always provided at the end of the flower, and when the insects go in to get this honey they brush themselves against these yellow dust bags, and some of the dust adheres to them; and when they visit the next flower they rub it off on to its sticky knob, and in this way the flowers become "crossed," as it is called. Now you see what a good thing it is for the insects to visit the flowers. And another curious thing is that they do not go, the bees in particular, to different flowers on the same journey. They may take a look at the others as they go buzzing along, but they do on until they find the flower for which they are hunting.

Have you never seen the bees as they visited the flowers, in some, like the larkspur, staying so long you would think they were preparing to make a night of it, while in other blossoms they would stay but a minute, as if to say, "There's nothing for me there?" Just where they stay longest for honey there they are most needed in the transfer of pollen.

Did you know that the colors, shapes and scents, too, are just so many baits and traps set by nature to entice insects to come to the flowers as well as the honey, which is secreted in various parts of the flower, sometimes in little bags or glands, as in the petals of the buttercups, sometimes in transparent drops, as in the honeysuckle?

The gaudy poppy, the hollyhock, sunflower, golden dandelion, the blue forget-me-not and hosts of others hold out their gay signs, which the insects readily catch sight of as they pass along in their search for honey.

Would you believe that bees are not only attracted by bright colors, but actually know one color from another? They do, and know, too, just which they want to visit.

The sweet scents and delicious odors which come from the beds of mignonette, rosemary, mint and other flowers, even the small flowers of the laurustinus, are guides as true to attract insects as the bright coloring of the leaves. The honeysuckle is one whose odor is much stronger at night, the aphinx moth being its favorite visitor, seeking its honey and carrying its pollen. If you go near the primroses at sunset you will be surprised to find what a sweet scent they give out, just as if they were calling for some of the night insects to visit them.

How many white and dull-looking flowers are sweet-scented, while the gaudiest, such as the hollyhocks, tulips, foxglove and others, have little or no scent at all. Then there are some with beautiful coloring and scent combined, and with graceful shapes, too, each having their visitors, who do their appointed work in the world, and perhaps a good deal more faithfully than you and I do ours. There are even greater contrivances still to secure the insects' visits; flowers open and shut at different times. The daisy opens at sunrise and closes at sunset, while the primrose opens when the daisy goes to bed; for those insects carrying only night pollen fly only by night, and so with the day insects, who of course, only visit the flowers they find open in the day.

The whole family of [illegible] fertilized in this way. They are all plants of rare beauty, most grotesque in shape, too. Their forms greatly resemble those of birds and animals. One species is precisely like the mouth of a cutter-fish, and others like spiders, in which the resemblance is equally strong; and in not a few species the flowers exactly imitate the various insects. This is particularly the case in the butterfly orchid, the flowers are so exactly in form and color like a gaudy butterfly. Can the likeness be a sort of decoy, do you think, to allure the very kind of insects they want for the fertilizing of the same flowers? Very likely it is so.

But there are seeds that are fertilized by the wind, and thus transported from flower to flower. They do not need the insects to help them, but you will find, when that is the case, that they are nearly devoid of scent, or brilliant color—nothing to demand attention from anybody, and never for a moment to be compared to their more gaudy brethren that are left alone for the insects, without whom we should not have the feast of perfumes and color with which our woods and meadows abound every year, for they are necessary to the plants very existence. So we see that every tint, streak, shape, color can be accounted for, and that the distribution of all these things over flowers is not accidental. There are, indeed, strange contrivances in every department of the natural world, and the more we know about it the more we see what strong evidences of intention there is in it all. Every blossom and every creeping insect brings abundant testimony to the existence and providence of a great Designer and Ordainer, without whom not only the sparrow, but even a grain of pollen cannot fall.

Let us, as far as we are able, become better acquainted with this great mystery of life, this Unseen Power, and pour out our unceasing thanks to the Giver of all, not only for the pleasure they give us, but because they are the objects of the same providential care.

"He prayeth most who loveth most
All things, both great and small;
For the dear Lord that loveth us

THE SIXTH VIAL.

"And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates: and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared."—Rev. xvi. 12.

The drying up of a river is a gradual process. The river may be passable before all the water is quite gone. So, if the drying up of the River Euphrates refers to the waning of the Crescent, which doubtless it does, and the continued decrease of Turkish power and territory, so the obstacles that stand in the way of the fulfillment of God's promises may be gone while Turkey has nominal hold of the land of the Jews.

The downfall of ancient Babylon was accomplished by the drying up of the bed of the River Euphrates. The besieging army constructed a new channel for the waters of the Euphrates, turned the stream off from the city, and so dried up its old bed. The conquering army got possession by marching along the old bed of the river that they had drained. The incident is laid hold of by the prophet in the Book of Revelation, to show that "the drying up of the river" is clearing the way for that hour when "Great Babylon" shall come in "remembrance before God." It is during the time of the Sixth Vial that it is said, "Behold, I come as a thief." We see the reiterated proofs of God's hand in the demolition of Turkish Power. One province after another, one territory after another, is wrenched from the Sultan's grasp in spite of every alliance and every treaty. The Great Powers combined to secure the int[illegible]

[illegible] this age has! Every m[illegible] East makes the purpose more distinct, and the impending crisis more inevitable. The world is suddenly startled by each step in the incessant decline of Turkish power; men are struck for a moment by the inexplicable repetition of the same drying up of the river, then they fall back, and think it has come to nothing. No doubt there may be a little calm between the very last warning and the final act, so that there may be more danger in the movement when it seems calm than when the warning is in our ears.

The world's day of probation is timed to the fraction of a second. One time ran out (fourteen generations) from the time of Abraham to David; another, from David to the Captivity; another time, from the Captivity to the birth of Christ. Our time is the last of this dispensation; and how far gone it, indeed, must be! We are near the time of the first resurrection; there is expectation in the air, and sudden surprises are looked for now, and felt to be the characteristic of the age we live in. "The time of the dead is at hand that they should be judged." Their long, silent sleep is fast drawing to its close. We are nearing the break of eternal day. "The kingdoms of this world will soon become the kingdoms of God and of his Christ." There will no longer be Bismarks, and German Emperors, and autocratic Czars of Russia, but the Lord Christ will reign from pole to pole.

In this stirring age the active interference of God is becoming most solemnly apparent. Statesmen are but his servants, whether they know it or not. The evidence of a secret guiding hand grows stronger with every event. The power that is so actively working works with a hidden hand. The approaching footstep of the Judge grows louder and more unmistakable. The path by which Turkey goes down (and so clears the road for the restoration of the Jews to their own land) and the power that shall give the finishing blow, are all predetermined. Just because Turkey holds Palestine, and the time is at hand for the restoration of the Jews, is Turkey suffering these Divine judgments. Palestine is situated (with a view to the position it is to hold in the Millennium) just at the corner of three continents, and the Mediterranean Sea was formed to make a way for Western nations to reach its shores.

Soon the mystery of God shall be finished, and "he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people and the veil that is spread over all nations." What is that veil? We are surrounded by much that is unrevealed to sense. We have no capacity by which to recognize the presence of much that exists around us. Part is visible and part is unseen. "The things that are seen are temporal, the things that are unseen are eternal." Not absent because they are not seen, but present. In the glory of God a long way off? Is there not an impenetrable veil hiding the gory that shines all around us? Is the glory of God confined to the same locality? Is it not shining in its brightness all around us? We go out into the dark night and look at the sky, and we think how dull and dark the universe is. What a dingy scene, the little stars just sufficient to make the darkness visible.

But for the veil we should see it in another fashion, and the glory of God must be flashing and shining all through the vast spaces of the universe. "The moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed when the Lord of Hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously. The Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and thy God thy glory."—E. B., in Prophetic News, and Israel's Watchman.

An Unprofitable Alliance.

In regard to the supposed benefit of the church by State patronage, or an alliance between the Church and the State, Lord Macaulay speaks as follows. These words are worthy of careful consideration:—

"[illegible] ark of God was never taken [illegible] by the [illegible] of the Philistines. The real security of Christianity is to be found in its benevolent morality, in its exquisite adaptation to the human heart, in the facility with which its scheme accommodates itself to the capacity of every human intellect, in the consolation which it bears to the house of mourning, in the light with which it brightens the gloom of the grave. To such a system it can bring no addition of dignity or of strength, that it is part and parcel of the common law.

"The whole history of Christianity shows, that she is in far greater danger of being corrupted by the alliance of power, than of being crushed by its opposition. Those who thrust temporal sovereignty upon her treat her as their prototypes treated her author. They bow their knee, and spit upon her; they cry, "Hail!" and smite her on the cheek; they put a scepter in her hand, but it is a fragile reed; they crown her, but it is with thorns; they cover with purple the wounds which their own hands have inflicted on her; and inscribe magnificent titles over the cross on which they have fixed her to perish in ignominy and pain."—Essay on Southey's Colloquies, from American Sentinel.

A Difficult Language.

A Boston man, who has spent about fourteen years on the east and west coast of Africa, says that the language of the natives of the Congo country is difficult to acquire, and that he knows of only one European who has mastered it sufficiently to understand it, though he can speak very little. It appears to be composed of short words, which, in the rapid manner of speaking, seem to be run together, and each sentence to consist of a longer or shorter compound word. It is capable of strong emphasis, and is quite expressive, but the natives are not given to gesticulation even when talking excitedly, excepting always the fetishers or fetish man when dealing out damnation to transgressors. The trouble in acquiring the language seems to be the general unwillingness of the natives to teach it to white men. It is said, however, that some of the Portuguese who are born and raised there have acquired the language, and speak it as fluently as natives.—N. Y. Sun.

Communications.

The Gospel Way for Christian Character in this Life, and the Scriptural Doctrine of Perfection, as Opposed to the Irrational Teachings of Apostasy.

Singular as it may seem in view of all the errors preached and believed on this subject, there is no doctrine about which the Scriptures are more specific than man's perfection in character.

It appears prominently in the teachings of Moses: it is emphasized like upon line and precept upon precept by God's "mouthpieces," the prophets: it is typified for us in the object-lessons of the Levitical law: it is taught us analogically in all the parable language of the Scriptures, Old and New; it is sung to us in its hymns and odes; it is pictured to our imaginations in its pastorals and idyls; the logic of its rationale is summed up for us in the masterly philosophical reasoning of Paul; its terminology is once for all carefully defined for us in the writings of the Wise Man, made wise for this very purpose. And the great purpose of it all strides with the majestic import of a new creation through the grand old epic of "Job called Job."

Notwithstanding and in spite of all the flood of light, the average Christian truth-seeker is too evidently still in "gross darkness" and following the rash light of "vain imaginations." Scarcely [illegible] any name and nature in [illegible] for partial, gradual enlightened by God's word. Thank God it is coming to be recognized as a well down inductive conclusion that in proportion as a man's creed is narrow it will be found that his knowledge of God's word and character is deficient and his own charity, (sanctified love) the crowning grace of Christian character, is in a still more lamentable degree wanting.

In every phase of heresy, sectarianism or denominationalism (these terms are practically synonymous terms from the standpoint of Scripture teaching) some form of carnal perfection is assumed as a fit premise of righteousness and as the first and best of reasons for separation from other brethren who claim to be seeking the same great end and object, but who do not speak the same Shibboleth. I say some form of carnal perfection. For any assumption of perfection possible in this life and this side of the resurrection is fundamentally unscriptural and erroneous. Calling a lie truth does not make it true, and calling any such carnal assumption spiritual sanctification does not make it so. It is in view of just this weakness incident to the natural pride of man's reason that the doctrine of humility is everywhere in the Scripture so vigorously emphasized. Any humility under the garb of sectarianism therefore from the very nature of the case must necessarily be strongly impregnated with "Uriah Heepism."

For if not more perfect in righteousness than your brother whom your sectarianism excludes, to what end your sectarianism; and if the first principle of your constitution is Pharisaism why the pretense of humility? Moreover if humility is not at the foundation of any true value in Christian character, what is Christ's teaching in the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican?

Like Pharisaism, all heresy teaching and practice is only another name for "legalism." The person practicing it has withdrawn himself from the sphere of liberty into which the Gospel has called him, the great law of which is growth—growth in grace and knowledge, a growth analogous to all other forms of growth, which is from seed to fruit. Therefore the wisdom of the supreme test we are instructed to apply. "By their fruits shall ye know them." We do well to give heed therefore to the exhortation, "For ye are not under law but under grace." Sectarianism sustains the same relation to the growth of God's truth in the world and in men's minds that a false culture which should attempt to take away God's sunshine and rain from the hoped for growth of the seed sown in our fields, would to the natural growth. Thank God, in practice the one is as impracticable to carry out to any great extent as the other. A happy day will it be for man when he learns that he is only a husbandman in God's vineyard and that his principal duties are to watch, to guard and dress the vine of Sorek—the vine of his Lord's own planting, and that the place in that vineyard where he is to stand guard is right over his own heart, supplementing this watchfulness with all diligence in trimming back the rank growth of his own inordinate desires and selfishness. Betimes he may perhaps be able to lend his neighbor a helping hand in the same blessed work. But of one thing he may be sure that this growth of grace in his own heart will "shed abroad" its aroma like the budding vine, and will be to every passer-by a sweet promise of the fruit to come, as well as the evidence of present satisfaction; so, that "seeing your good works" thus blessed by Him who alone can energize any and all germinal life, and clothe it with a body or organic constitution of things "after its kind," men will glorify your Father who is in heaven.

The fundamental error of all so-called "perfectionism," "legalism" or "sectarianism," is an undue haste in arriving at conclusions, which are really not conclusions, in prejudging, in "judging things before their time," and in using the a priori method of reasoning instead of the inductive. The fundamental errors of its terminology run through all its instrumentalities and work. The terminology of any system of teaching, whether it be religious or secular, addressed to man's reason, contains its germinal life. And especially is this true of God's word and works. It is emphasized in so many ways that this fact as to a fundamental truth, is beyond question or cavil.

And I now come to a practical application of the argument to the true Scriptural doctrine of purification as opposed to the manifold irrational teachings of apostasy. The four cardinal doctrines of Scripture which indicate [illegible] growth in grace, are in their order, 1st, justification; 2d, sanctification; 3d, purification; 4th, holiness, and they are very closely typified and pictured out for us in the Levitical law, or rather ceremonial law, or rather the first three are, the necessity of the latter being closely shadowed forth by the negations and inefficiency of the law to accomplish this supreme end toward which all its so called perfections point. See Paul's masterly argument in Romans and the still more pointed application of it in Hebrews, namely, the insufficiency of the law to fully accomplish the work of grace. So prominent is this great truth made in the Gospel, that notwithstanding the law has its place in the redemptive plan and purpose of God, we are emphatically told that we who are under "the New Covenant" are not under law, but under grace. And yet in the same breath with the announcement of its inefficacy to "perfect" anything in grace, we are told that it is "perfect" in its way and kind. The blunder of Gentile theology in presuming and assuming that there can be holiness in the flesh and in the natural body, arises primarily from mistranslating the words which mean exist, sacred and sanctification, by holy and holiness, in so many places in God's word. For instance, in Romans i. 12, which properly translated reads, "So that the law is sanctified (not holy) and the commandment sanctified (not holy) and just and good." Again the substitution of the Old quoted into the New, in substance, as "Be ye perfect even as I am perfect," should read: "Be ye perfect because (or since) I am perfect," and is naturally the exhortation of the Teacher of Teachers by example, but a prophecy of the ultimate perfection which will come with an actual participation in the divine nature at the resurrection of the just. Again, "Be ye holy as I am holy," should read "Be ye sanctified since I am sanctified," the exhortation and the teaching by example being the same as above. The rationale of the argument being that one who has attained unto perfect sanctification and holiness, the good purpose, however, which took hold upon sanctification as a means of this end, being still alive and active as a regenerative agent or agency to bring others who need it unto the same state of perfection. Even the "holy spirit" so-called, is "sanctified spirit," the rationale of the argument in relation to it as an agency being this, that in the supreme test through which we, as regenerated and regenerated creatures of his hand, are going to strive not with the flesh and blood alone, but with spiritual agencies, some of which are sanctified under God's hand and purpose to assist our weakness, while some are unsanctified and who, though permitted in the wisdom and beneficence of God to do just what they do, we are distinctly told and warned are opposed and that too actively to the working out of God's good purpose in us. The whole teaching of the Scripture is plain and emphatic on this point, viz: that God has offered, under the conditions of his covenant, to supplement man's natural weakness and inability with the supernatural energy and ability of sanctified spirit. John's conception of this great fact and expression of it under the parable illustration of "The Paraclete," or the legal advocate for the purposes of spiritual instruction does not alter the plain teaching of the fact, any more than Christ's own statement in similar parable language that he is "the true bread that cometh down from heaven," makes him a literal loaf of bread. The idolatrous worship of "the holy wafer," in the Catholic church, is just such a perversion of the truth arising from fundamental misconception of the use of language as the Protestant worship of "The Holy Ghost." Does God mean what he says or does he not, when he says that there is no other name given in heaven nor on earth whereby or (through which) men can be saved than the name of Jesus? A name in the sense here used is a personal application. Did John intend the terms "paracletos," or Holy Ghost to be understood as personal applications? Did he intend that his hearers and readers should understand that he was speaking of a person distinct in personality and all that personality implies from God and "his Christ?" If so, then "He has given His glory to another, or John so understood it. For those who so interpret John have in fact attributed to that person called "The Holy Ghost" all the attributes and powers which belong to God himself. But when corrected of the absurdity of this sort of reasoning (to say nothing of its blasphemy) they hide behind the term "Godhead," which is a synonym in English for the divine nature, and say that God and Godhead are also synonymous terms, reasoning that because God imparted to his son Jesus Christ the entirety of the divine nature, constituting "Godhead" for divine nature here also, he therefore imparted to him also his own personality. The reasoning in both cases is illogical and absurd and worthy of "the schoolman" who originated it out one of the nineteenth century. John defines this term before he uses it in a parable sense, thus putting us on our guard against this very misconception, by stating that by it he means "the Spirit of the truth." How important then that we who desire this divine help to supplement our weakness should love "truth in the inner man" and when we apprehend it, be faithful witnesses to it.

We are called upon to glorify God in our lives "which is our reasonable service" as the creatures of his hand and the constant exhortation of his word "to give God the glory," not some other person; even "The Christ" did this and taught it. I do not know of any exhortation or commandment in the Scriptures to glorify a person called "The Holy Ghost." God himself, we are distinctly told, is a Spirit or Spiritual basis: with a distinct Spiritual personality of his own, which is like every other individuality his especial glory. The recognition of this fact as an obligation, yea the obligation of obligations resting upon all his animated creation is the fundamental teaching of his word. The recognition of this obligation is the first step in any true worship, and the ultimate end or object to be reached in the plan and purpose of the Almighty in creation and redemption is the bringing about of this recognition.

We see the picture of its accomplishment in John's vision of it on Patmos in the 18th verse of the 5th chapter of the Apocalypse, which reads as follows; "And every colony (or generated thing) that is in the heavens and on the earth and beneath the earth (that is its surface) and which are upon the sea, and all the things therein (in them i. e. the heavens, earth and sea) heard I saying unto him who sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb, be the praise and the honor and glory and the controlling power for the ages of the ages." Is this a correct picture? If so where is the modern church's recognition and worship of a person called "The Holy Ghost?" Ye who believe this doctrine will do well to heed Christ's warning to the Sadducees on another fundamental error, "Ye do err not knowing the Scriptures nor God's ability," and another "In vain do ye worship me teaching men's commandments and teachings." And again "Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life." In his prayer in the 17th chap. of John 17, 18, 19 verses Christ says, "Sanctify them (not make them holy) in thy truth. Thy word is truth.

18. Even as thou didst send me into the cosmos, have I also sent them into the cosmos

19. And for their sake am I sanctifying myself, that they also may become sanctified in truth."

In John xiv. 18, Christ says; "I am not going to leave you orphans." What is an orphan? One who has lost both father and mother, is it not? In the parable language of Scripture is not Zion the mother of us all? And who did Christ in so many ways teach us was "Our Father"?

Do you suppose he meant to subvert all this teaching by substituting for this One All Father another person called "The Holy Ghost?"

No, he says here I will come unto you (or lit. am coming) and this is but the closing part of the old Jehovah formula which reads "The one who is and was and is coming." He is predicting of the time when God will be in them to will and to do by his sanctifying spiritual presence and power that which is satisfactory to himself.

When you pray to God therefore pray to him as a Spirit not as a "ghost," and beware of "ghostly teachings." Remember that Christ says he was still sanctifying himself when he offered that wonderful prayer for his disciples so near the close of his blessed ministry. Keeping these things in mind you will not be likely to be led away into false conceptions of "perfection" and holiness in the flesh. Remember that there are several "perfections" for every saint to go through in the sight of God before reaching Christ although "without sin" we are told had to be "perfected through suffering," and this too while, as he tells us, he is still in a state of sanctification before he has reached the "perfection" of which he speaks in another place as the third day perfection. "And the third day I shall have been perfected." This third day perfection as I understand the Scriptures is man's beginning in holiness. He will then have a holy or organism Spiritual in which he can be holy and not before. He may be accounted holy, just and good now in view of what God intends to make him then. That is all. It is the accounting in faith not in works. It is the accounting he made of Habraam (Abraham).

It is the accounting he made of Job and the whole lesson of trial which God put Job through, was to get his false "perfection" notions out of his head and heart, to show him the difference, in a word there is between "justification" or person and even the next "step upward" thorough sanctification; and to bring him to good confession of abject humility where he could with full sincerity of heart give God the glory as he ought.

LIGHT.

The blessings of light can be truly appreciated by those alone who have been deprived of them, and who through the loss of vision have been cut off from the pleasures which that sense is able to afford. To a man lost upon the prairie, or in the depths of the forest with the gloom of darkness around him the appearance of the morning light is glorious indeed. So to lay benighted mankind the dawning of a spiritual light is hailed with rapture. Today the light of the gospel which first dispensed its glory upon the hills and vales of Palestine eighteen centuries ago is shining forth over all the world with power to cheer the hearts of sorrowful and penitent sinners.

Christ said to his disciples—"As long as I am in the world I am the light of the world;" and then moistening his hand and kneading the clay, he applied this to the eyes of the blind man, and restored to him his sight. This operation is typical of what Christ can do for any and all who apply to him in penitence for the healing of their spiritual vision. Christ has a power greater than any temporal light, for those who receive his light are themselves called by him the light of the world, Matt. v. 14. What a noble distinction this to professors of Christianity to be likened to a great light and to a city set on a hill. The Master gives to them this commandment, "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven."

Paul exhorts his brethren watch and be sober, as they are the "children of light" and it behooves them to keep aloof from the sins and pleasures of the world and avoid all things which lead to darkness. Our conduct and our walk in life will prove whether we are the true children of light, for if we devote ourselves to worldly pleasures and mingle with those who walk in darkness we are no longer children of light, but children of darkness. Men and women complain that the demands of Christianity call for a forfeiture of too many of the diversions and pleasures which help to make human life enjoyable; they make this complaint because they have not received enough of the light to be able to perceive the pleasures which attend Christian walk and conduct. Let such study God's commands and associate themselves with Christians and enter into the occupations and duties incumbent upon those who lead Christian lives, then they will perceive the [illegible] tice of the precepts of Christianity and become true children of the light.

There is a test by which we may know that we are walking in the light, the true light. John [illegible] what it is: "And hereby we know that we know him, if we keep his commandments." And the apostle goes on to explain that we are obliged [illegible] the old commandments and [illegible] our brethren. And this we must do. A member of a church organization or a minister who disregards God's commands, or delights in bickerings and contentions is not walking in the light, and is not one of the children of light. Likewise men who are under the influence of priestcraft and never search the word of God for themselves are walking in darkness. People say hard things about the Bible and God and Christianity. Yet the majority seldom look into the sacred book, never make themselves acquainted with God's commandments or try to keep them, and rely upon what they hear or what they imagine to support their arguments. They are children of darkness. Some say the Bible is too obscure, it is hard to understand, there are too many contradictions in it. I believe that the portions of the Bible which are difficult to understand are made so to make us study the harder, awaken our interest and to give us the opportunity for a more thorough perception of the light. That which we secure with difficulty we desire the most to retain. To be a Christian means work, it means a diligent searching for the truth, and if we allow our zeal to grow cold sooner or later we will be found walking in [illegible] not in light.

Jesus was the [illegible] "He was the true light [illegible] every man that cometh into the world." Then how is it that so many are walking in the darkness? Because they blind themselves and become unconscious of the light shed about them. "His own received him not." Their lot is darkness. But what a glorious promise is that to his followers: "To as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God." Sons of God! This would be an honor beyond all honors we can conceive of in this world, to be so near to God that we shall be called his sons. Then shall we walk in never-failing light.

John saw in his vision the New Jerusalem, and he tells us they had no need of the sun nor the moon there, for the glory of God did lighten it. There night never comes; and here—

"No darkness have we who in Jesus abide,
For Light of the world is Jesus;
We walk in the light when we follow our Guide
For Light of the world is Jesus."

Editor Restitution:

I acknowledge receipt of your New Years' issue of the 6th inst, and I trust the readers of its instructive columns, in the advocacy and defence of the Gospel as proclaimed by our Lord Jesus and His Apostles, will make a renewed and more glorious effort to extend its circulation, by obtaining many new subscribers. It is a journal calculated to increase and strengthen the faith of the followers of our Lord, and to attract the sinner to believe and obey the glad tidings of the Kingdom of God, and for that purpose worth more than many evangelists. I mailed a few numbers to my daughter, who responded as follows:—"The papers arrived safely. Many thanks for them. I send you 25 cents in stamps and want you to forward it to the editor of THE RESTITUTION, and if I like it will take it longer. I think it a good paper." I am greatly pleased that I succeeded in getting her to take it as she is my youngest daughter, and the only one of my six children of our church and faith.

Hoping God may bless and preserve you in health, and THE RESTITUTION more liberally sustained for the truths sake, remain yours in the hope of the near coming of our Lord, King of kings and Lord of lords, to sit upon his Father David's throne.

Editor Restitution:

At our Christmas festivities I tried to get some subscribers but the most of them had all the reading they wanted and could not afford to spend more money, so I failed in getting you even a trial subscriber of three months. But I could not think of doing nothing for a paper I think so much of. I call it my best brother as it visits me every week and is always full of good things that cheer and enlighten and build up. I should feel very lonely without it as it helps me to read God's word understandingly, for which I feel very thankful to the brethren that write for the paper, and it is my prayer that God may bless all that are connected with the paper and I hope the financial embarrassment may be removed. Yours for the good cause.

It is rather curious for European peace to hear that Krupp's famous works at Essen have turned out a larger number of guns during the last three months than are usually produced in a whole year. The heaviest delivery was made to Turkey, after which came Greece and Servia.

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 18.—Marie Augustin, an aged negress, said to be 125 years old, died in this city on Friday and was buried yesterday. [illegible] no accurate data by which [illegible] it is certain [illegible] to extreme old age. Her daughter, Celestine Maturine, is 88 years old. This latter fact is well authenticated. Celestine was the youngest of seven children, and says that her mother was brought to this country from Africa 105 years ago, at which time she was a grown woman. All the children were born in America. She says that her mother lived in New Orleans for 100 years. The old woman was in good health and fairly active until Christmas. After that she lost her strength without apparent cause. She died quietly and without pain.

Sir Chas. Warren, whose name is so well known in connection with recent explorations in and beneath Jerusalem, lately remarked, in the course of a lecture on the results of such researches as he had taken part in, that "every step he took as an explorer gave him fresh evidence of the implicit truth of the details of the Bible narrative. He had witnessed at the part of the Red Sea, where the Israelites must have crossed, an almost similar phenomenon to that recorded in the Bible, large sheets of water being raised on high by the wind quite long enough for people to go in safety on the land thus made dry." Adverting also to the question of the return of the Jews to their own land, "he suggested, that if Palestine were to be recolonized by Jews, the best immigrants for that purpose would, in his opinion, come from the agricultural districts of Morocco."

Yearning for the End.

Breathe soft and low, O whispering wind,
Above the tangled grasses deep,
Where those who loved me long ago
Forgot the world and fell asleep.
No tomb-or shaft, or sculptured urn,
Or mausoleum's empty pride,
Tells to the curious passer by
Their virtues or the time they died.

I count the old, familiar names,
O'ergrown with moss and lichen gray,
Where tangled brier and creeping vine
Are rent in crumbling tablets away.
The summer sky is softly blue;
The birds still sing the sweet, old strain;
But something from the summer time
Is gone, that will not come again.

So many voices have been hushed,
So many song-harvests reaped for aye,
So many hands I used to touch
Are folded over hearts of clay.
The noisy world recedes from me:
I cease to hear its praise or blame;
The mossy sombres echo back
No hollow sound of empty fame.

I only know that calm and still
They sleep beyond life's woe and wail,
Beyond the fleet of rolling clouds,
Beyond the shadow of the vale.
I only feel that, tired and worn,
I fain upon the highway lave,
And gaze with yearning eyes beyond
On fields that shine supremely fair.

PROBLEMS OF PROPHETIC FAITH.

It must be evident, even to a superficial observer that there is a wide diversity in the reception given by men to the prophetic words of the seers of old and those uttered by Jesus himself. They are accepted, or partly accepted, or repudiated. We may profitably consider this fact, for it suggests problems which ought to be solved.

The first promise given after the deluge was the declaration of Jehovah to his servant Noah: "That while the earth remaineth, seed time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease," Gen. xlii. 22. This promise has received, above all others, a universal sanction, acceptance, and belief, every one, without the least doubt, expects the coming of the seasons, in which the influences of Orion and Pleiades will be felt, and when at the set time the golden grains will be sown and harvested. This is the only prophecy and promise of Jehovah which is accepted ocumically and through all ages.

The same Jehovah solemnly to his servant David: "If ye can break my covenant of the day, and my covenant of the night, and that there should not be day and night in their season; then may also my covenant be broken with David my servant, that he should not have a son to reign upon his throne; and with the Levites my ministers . . . . . for I will cause their captivity to return, and have mercy on them," Jer. xxxiii 21–26.

This prophetic word and promise runs parallel in every respect with the promise given to Noah, and is an appendix to the former; and yet how different is its acceptance! It is only partly believed! How comparatively few people, yea, how very few Christians believe that the Jews, the whole house of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob shall be restored to their own land of Canaan, and that the Son of David, "Messiah Jesus," shall be "the ruler in Israel!" Micah v. 2; Matt. ii. 6; Ps. cv. 8. Can any inquiring mind solve this problem? The Jews are in existence, and as a nation are among us, and that fact is as clear as the existence and returning of day and night. Canaan is waiting for the return of her down-trodden children, and the prophecy is never yet fulfilled. What are the reasons that the same Christians, who believe literally the promise given to Noah, will spiritualize or allegorize the promise given to Jeremiah? Indeed, this is a paradox. Here is a problem to be solved.

Now, nineteen centuries ago, the archangel was sent as an ambassador to earth, to a lonely home of a virgin residing at the borders of the sea of Galilee. His proclamation was: "Behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb and bring forth a son, and shall call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end," Luke i. 32, 33.

This message, the greatest and highest ever received from the throne of God, is only believed in part. That Jesus is born, that his name is Jesus, and that his name is greater than any human name ever known are facts literally and unchallenged, accepted, and believed by every true Christian without any doubt.

That that same Jesus is the Son of the Highest now reigning, and is the very foundation-stone of, Christianity, and no one should or would admit that "those words" were spoken in a figurative or allegorical manner. All acknowledge that they are literal and have a literal meaning: "Jesus is the Son of the living God." And if so, then, we ask, Why do the majority of the same Christians, yea, greater scholars, deny that the following words: "That Jesus shall possess the throne of David, and shall have the kingly reign over the house of Jacob" are literal? Why do they substitute the throne of the Father in the heavens for the throne of David on earth, and declare that the Christian Church, "the Ecclesia," must be taken for the house of Jacob? Here is another enigma, another problem to be solved.

The greatest of all the prophets, by whom all the prophets spoke, God manifested and tabernacled in the flesh, has revealed the truth: "That the Jews should fall by the sword, and that Jerusalem should be trodden down by the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled," Luke xxi. 24.

This prophecy is generally believed in a historical way. It cannot be gainsaid that the Jews are in the Diaspora, and that Jerusalem is trodden down by the worst of the nations. These are facts which are known and accepted. The great obstacle of the text is that we are now living in the times and the dispensation of the Gentiles. Many Christians have lost sight of that fact, "that the times of the Gentiles are not yet fulfilled," and that Jerusalem must first be made free—Israel be restored—and Jesus must first be revealed in his coming. Matt. xxiii. 38, 39; before the Gentile dispensation can come to an end. If this axiom was accepted and universally acknowledged it would make a revolution in thought and action, and produce the most glorious results.

The same authority quoted before has plainly told in Luke xvii 26–30: "And as it was in the days of the Son of man," and "likewise also as it was in the days of Lot, even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed,' we are plainly informed that the last days of this dispensation will be days resembling the antediluvian age of domineering, lawlessness, and atheism, combined with the world-renowned licentiousness and wickedness of Sodom.

This prophecy is disregarded by The general tenor of the doc- ched and believed to substantiate: That we are marching forward, with long strides, to millennial glory; that the nations will fall in line, and that the great army shall be heralded by ideas and motives which elevate and lead to human manhood and Christian brotherhood, and that it shall conquer. This doctrine is very enticing and lovely, yea, so acceptable to our preconceived ideas that it is not strange that the multitude have put their seal of approbation to it; and yet that doctrine is not in agreement with the tenor of Scripture and the mind of Jesus. We have the words of the great Master on this subject, Luke xviii. 8: "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" Truly another enigma is found here!

The great question for every true Christian is, What is the mind of Jesus? what truth is revealed to us by the Holy Spirit? and, how can we please the Father of all light and truth? And to this the answer must be, To accept and to believe his words in the manner and spirit in which he has given them to his people. Shall the covenant made with Noah have a perfect literal fulfillment, as we experience every day and every year, and shall not the same literal fulfillment be conceded to a higher, more glorious, and a more far-reaching covenant than ever the Noachian covenant can lay claim to? A covenant which "the angels desire to look into," 1 Pet. i. 12. We accord to both covenants the same place, and believe in their literal fulfillment.

It will be one of the great privileges of the age of the resurrection to review the chain of all the promises of God, and all the various links connected with them, and to see that every word has been fulfilled literally; and in holy joy to join and sing the heavenly anthem with the prophets of old and the apostles of the New Testaments, giving unitedly praise, honor, and glory "to him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." Amen. So let it be.—A. O. Pris, in Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

Baptism.

"It is objected that one preacher says immersion is baptism; another, sprinkling; and another, pouring. and they resort to lexicons, translations, historians, Greek, Latin, Hebrew; and in the midst of all this says a man, 'I cannot determine what is baptism.' At first sight, this has the appearance of a considerable perplexity, but there is an easy way of righting all this, to which we will now resort. Dismiss from your mind all new translations; trouble yourself no more about lexicons; turn your ear, for the present, away from all histories, except the Bible; nor shall you be troubled with one word from Greek, Latin, or Hebrew; you may throw aside the word 'immerse.' Now, will you hear the common version of King James? 'I will,' says a reader. All right. To the common version, then, we go. Where, then, in the common version, do we read of sprinkling for baptism? Do we not read that the Holy Spirit was 'shed forth?' We do; but 'shed forth' is not sprinkled; and if it were, it would be the Holy Spirit that was sprinkled, not water; nor is anything about baptism in it. There is no sprinkling for baptism in the common version, nor any other. Where, then, do you find pouring for baptism in the common version? We read that 'the Holy Spirit was poured out.' True, but 'poured' there does not mean baptism, or the Holy Spirit was baptized, for the Holy Spirit was 'poured out.' This pouring was not baptizing. You can find both sprinkling and pouring in the common version, but that is not baptizing, nor is either word used in the sense of that institution, nor for baptism.

Now, be careful and note down what you do find in the common version. What was the element used in baptizing. When the Lord was baptized, he 'went up straightway out of the water.' See Matt. iii. 16. This points to water as the element. 'John was baptizing in Enon, near Salem, because there was much water there.' John iii. 23. This also points to water as the element. Philip came to a certain water.' Acts viii. 36. The officer said, 'See, here is water,' and 'they both went down into the water' (v. 38), and 'came up out of the water, (v. 39). Peter said, 'Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized? Acts x. 47. These all point to the same element—water. This much is settled.

What is the next thing to inquire about? The quantity of the element used. Is there anything about this? Why was John baptizing in Enon, near, Salem? 'Because there was much water there.' See John iii. 23. Is there anything in the common version about where they found the water? Is there anything about bringing water to baptize? Nothing. Is there anything said about having water in a bowl or any other vessel? Not a word. Do we find anything about baptizing in a room, or in a house? Not a word. They were baptized of John in Jordan,' Mark i. 5, in Enon, John iii. 26. As Philip and the officer went on their way, 'they came unto a certain water.' This shows where they found the water. They found it in its native place. It was not brought to them; they went to it.

As all the surroundings throw some light on the subject, it will be proper to inquire what they did just previous to baptizing. Philip and the officer 'came unto a certain water.' See Acts viii. 36. Where did that place them? Certainly, at it. What next? They both went down into the water,' v. 38. But our preacher explains 'into' there to mean at or near by. You have forgotten that we are to stand by the common version. It says, "They came unto a certain water;' that is, to it, or at it. They then 'went down into the water, both Philip and the eunuch.' Down into the water means more than at it. Down into it gets the person in the right element and place, ready for baptizing; 'and he baptized him.' How was that done? What did the evangelist do to the candidate?

Paul says in Col. ii. 12, "Ye are buried with him in baptism." That is a plain transaction. Any man, learned or unlearned, can tell when that was done. In Rom. vi. 4; he says, 'We are buried with him by baptism.'

Any person can tell whether that is done or not, if he is an eye witness.

What followed after baptizing? The body was washed. See Heb. x. 22.

In sprinkling or pouring water on a candidate for baptism, the following items are out of place:

1. They do not generally find the water in its native place.

2. They do not go where there is much water.

3. They do not generally 'come unto a certain water,' but have a little water brought to them.

4. They do not generally go down into the water.

5. They do not bury in baptism.

6. They do come up out of the water.

7. The body is not washed with water.

Those who immerse go unto the water where there is much water, down into the water, bury in baptism, come up out of the water, and the body is washed with water. When this is done, the controversy about the action of baptism is the mind and conduct of the candidate is at an end. The conscience is at rest, and no further doubt remains in regard to it. This is not the case when sprinkling or pouring is used as baptism. Here the mind is continually unsettled, specially if the party reads or hears anything on immersion.

The plainness of the New Testament on this subject is such that, if any person follows its simple teaching, taking the obvious sense, there will never be any doubt left to harass and make the conscientious person unhappy. This is sufficient for any one honestly striving to do the will of God. If the heart is right in the sight of God, under the power of the faith of Christ, the belief with all the heart that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, and the repentance strong enough to result in a future good life, when the subject is buried in baptism, there will be no further fears, doubts, or scruples about the action of baptism."—Benjamin Franklin, Cincinnati, Ohio.

A Jewish Exodus.

It is remarkable that the revolutions and political changes which have during recent years emancipated large populations who were under the yoke of Turkey have brought misery to the Jews. It is not long since all Europe was aroused by the appeal for sympathy with the Bulgarian Christians. Roumania, Servia, and other provinces also claimed a share in public sympathy: yet no sooner have they secured independence and deliverance from Turkish misgovernment than they have begun to persecute.

In the provinces, as in some parts of Germany and Russia, the Jew has no protection for his person or property. In Roumania alone there are two hundred and fifty thousand Jews who are practically outlaws. These were not only born in the country, but their parents and ancestors for more than two centuries were born there. Yet under a law recently passed they are judged aliens, and are at any time liable to expulsion. On the complaint of any person who has a grudge against them a notice is issued requiring them to leave the country within twenty-four hours. So lately as October last a distinguished Jewish professor in the University of Bucharest, an author of European reputation, was unexpectedly served with such a notice, and was forced to leave his friends and property, and go immediately. Sometimes a number of Jewish families receive the notice at the same time, and then there is a large cart hired, and they all set out together for the frontier. It is by no means an uncommon spectacle in south-eastern Europe.

The unpopularity of the Jews is mainly due to the ability they possess in financial affairs. They succeed in trade where others fail, they lend money on mortgage, they discount bills, and in other ways gain money by business. The men who owe them money and the men who are their unsuccessful rivals in business rejoice in their expulsion, and are only too ready to set the machinery of the law in motion against them. Their unpopularity is extending, so that it is becoming increasingly difficult for them to find a place of refuge in which they can find a sphere for their talents. Evidently the Lord is stirring them from their resting-places and driving them into the wilderness, that He may prepare them for their settlement in their own land—an event which must now be near at hand.

Social-Meeting Testimonies.

They should be testimonies. Not sermonettes, nor long speeches, nor prolonged exhortations, but the witnessing of Christian hearts to the truth. Some laymen seem to think the prayer-meeting is a good place for them to practice preaching. Others improve the time to make a fine speech; some to criticise the church; others to ventilate their particular religious hobby; others to pour out their complaints, and make confession of (that which all know) what sinners they are; others to get off some new idea, or to express a different opinion from some one else; and still others to lecture the brethren upon the cold state of the church. But all such are death to a prayer-meeting. There should be no disputing, or wailing, or lecturing, or criticising, or preaching, or talking about disputed questions, in a prayer-meeting, but a testifying to the truth of Christ. If the subject is faith, let each one witness to the power of faith as he has found it in his particular relations in life. If the subject is hope, let each one tell how the gospel hope has helped him in conflicts. Whatever the theme may be, testify to its helpfulness to your every-day life; and these testimonies should be, like the prayers, prompt and tender.

"The Star of Bethlehem and the Sun of Righteousness."

"Where is he who was born king of the Jews? For we have seen his star in the east and are come to worship him," Matt. ii. 2–10.

"But unto you who fear my name shall the sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings." Mal. iv. 2.

There is one glory of the sun, another glory of the moon and another glory of the stars. 1 Cor. xv. 41.

1. The fact that Jesus Christ was once here should prepare us to look for anything revealed, however miraculous.

The accepted anniversary of his appearing brings before us a life so miraculously pure as to demand faith in "the record" of his miraculous birth. "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee, therefore that holy one who shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God! Luke i. 35.

Now the grandeur of the prophecies that he will return and rule the world, corresponds with the story of his nativity, the astronomical drapery of the star and finally of the sun! Also with the angel messengers and angelic chorus, "glory to God in the highest! On earth peace and good will to men!"

But the scenes of the second coming will expand from "the symboled star" to that of the sun. "For there is one glory of the sun, another glory of the moon and another glory of the stars."

At the first advent "the star" was sent; but unto you who fear my name shall the sun of righteousness arise "to usher in the great and notable day of the Lord."

2. The second coming is the proper theme of this anniversary, as it is the crowning truth of revelation! The sum of ancient promise and the glorious gospel of the blessed God, find their radiant center in the scenes of the second coming and day of Christ!

The first coming was marked by all the reality that distinguished the birth of Isaac, Moses or Samuel; hence, the future coming is given in the numbered order—"The second time"—and its purpose being "salvation," we should look for a like reality, as to his personal presence and his performance of all "the promises"—which are in him yea, and in him, Amen!"

At his first coming, he was the star of hope,—at his second coming he'll be "the sun" of the restitution!

Then, though he came to be "the light of the world;" yet a few only recognized him. But now, his coming is to be as "The Sun" to encircle and illumine the earth,—"Nothing hid from the heat thereof." "He will—unveil the nations—swallow up death in victory, and take away the rebuke of his people from all the earth—for the Lord hath spoken it." Isa. xxv. 8, 9.

"The moon symbol of the church, does not shine by its own light, like the stars," but reflects the light of the sun! Thus the moon demonstrates the continuity of the sun's existence, though unseen, and its proper office, as the orb of Day. Though absent within the veil Jesus lives and his "life is the light of men," as reflected by his Bride—the church.

The moon is not disparaged! It fills its supernatural sphere and sheds forth its superlative radiance in the nightly heavens. It serves as a world-wide reflector of the sun till the great "Day of God, shall dawn."

"The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork." The loftiest and most beneficent drapery of creation—sun moon and stars—is thus grouped together into one all-comprehending circle of truth, touching the loving will of God toward man, and earth! Psa. xcviii. John viii. 16; Rev. xxi. 1, 5.

"Forever singing as they shine,
The hand that made them is Divine."

Bro. Geo. R. Kramer's sermon Dec. 27, 1885, was based on the three texts quoted. Though not my privilege to hear it; yet on a brief report this notice is given. The light here reflected, (though as a hazy "moon" in comparison of "the sun")—may yet set forth the subject of the most complete and comprehensive panorama of the gospel of God!

To my apprehension it is most helpful to faith and hope to trace out this prettiest, and yet profoundest statement that creation and revelation combine to furnish. For grace and truth.

DO PEOPLE GO TO HEAVEN WHEN THEY DIE?

To the law and the testimony, Isa. viii. 20. The soul that sinneth it shall die. Ezek. xviii. 4, 20. In death there is no remembrance of thee. Psa. vi. 5, and cxlvi. 4. The soul ceaseth for ever (in the second death). Psa. xlix. 8. Also their love and their hatred is now perished. Eccl. ix. 5, 6. It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body. 1 Cor. xv. 44, 46. Christ died and rose again according to the Scriptures. 1 Cor. xv. 3, 6. His soul was made an offering for sin. Isa. liii., Psa. xxii. 15, and Zech. xiii. 7. It behooved Christ to suffer (die) and rise from the dead. Luke xxiv. 46. We see Jesus who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death . . . . that he might taste death for every man. Heb. ii. 9. Being made perfect through suffering he became the author of . . . . salvation. Heb. ii. 10; iii. 9. Called of God a high priest. Heb. v. 10. What saith the law? There shall no man come up with thee. Exo. xxxiv. 3. See also Exo. xix. 12, 13. There shall be no man in the tabernacle of the congregation while the high priest is making atonement. Lev. xvi. 17. And the whole multitude of the people was waiting without. Luke i. 10 Wherefore the law was our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, Gal. iii. 24, and shadow of heavenly things. Heb. viii. 5. Into the second went priest alone, Heb. ix. 7, which was a figure of the time, the present. Heb. ix. 9. For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are figures of the true, but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us. Heb. ix. 24. And says where I go ye cannot come. John vii. 34; viii. 21; xiii. 33. I will come again. John xvi. 3.

The foregoing Scriptures point to and establish several facts:

1. That souls die, cease for ever, (in the second death). Psa. xxxvii. 10; 2 Thes. i. 9.

2. That death is an unconscious state. Eccl. ix. 5; Isa. xxvi. 16.

3. Christ's soul, person, was made an offering for sin (i. e. put to death), otherwise there was no atonement and could be no resurrection. Acts ii. 31, 36.

4. That Christ did rise from the dead.

5. By virtue of his obedience and shed blood Christ has entered into the holiest of all (i. e. himself) as our High Priest.

6. That while [illegible] stonement and acting as our high priest in the holiest of all, the people must wait without. For the result of the doctrine, belief and presumption of people entering the holiest of all (i. e. going to heaven when they die) while Christ is making the atonement, see Exo. xix 12, 13.

7. That eternal life and immortality depend upon a resurrection from the dead, therefore we may say eternal life is the gift of God through Jesus Christ our Lord, not through Adam. Rom. v. 7; vi. 23; 1 Cor. xv. 21.

Did Christ and the thief go to Paradise on the day of crucifixion? See Matt. xii. 40; John xx. 17. Our preaching unto you was not yea and nay. 2 Cor. i. 18; Gal. i. 8. But the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine. 2 Tim. iv. 3; 2 Thes. ii. 3-8. Mystery Babylon, the great mother of harlots, etc. Rev. xvii. Come out of her, people. Rev. xviii. 4.

BENJAMIN ACKLEY.

Easy to be Good.

One dear sister says "If we could always live in a big meeting, it would be easy to be good." And so it would, we are happy then; we see dear faces glowing with love, and listen to prayer and song and exhortation. The best and noblest feelings of our hearts are aroused. We think we will go home and always be good. And we are made better. Our good resolutions are strengthened, new plans and purposes, for work are formed. We look with newer, fresher zeal for the passing events that are to herald the coming of our King. We pray with more fervor, and all hate and malice is driven from our hearts. We love everybody with the plying love that would reach out and save.

Our Heavenly Father knew what was best for us when he gave the command to "forget not the assembling of ourselves together." I came home from the little gathering at Plymouth, feeling almost as if I had been to some heavenly country, far away from strife, and cruelty and wrong. Then dear brethren and sisters, make "it easy to be good," by thus meeting together and speaking to one another in psalms and hymns, and spiritual songs, making melody in your hearts to the Lord. "Wisdom's ways are ways of pleasantness and all her paths are peace." Let us take her paths for the end thereof is life.

AT JESUS' FEET.

Lord Jesus, life is hard, as thou dost know,
And hours of peace and rest are very rare;
But it is sweet, after the toil and woe,
To nestle close to thee with thoughts of prayer.
If thou will lay thy hand upon my head,
I shall arise refreshed and comforted.

Dear Master, I sit sitting at thy feet:
I would not miss a look or lose a word:
The boys is very low when we meet;
I fain would see and hear none but the Lord:
I long to lay aside joy, grief, and fear,
And only know and feel that thou art near.

The world's discords at times ever more
Clang round about my ears and weary me:
There were rough words, angered hearts before
That troubled me: but now I come to thee.
O Jesus! quiet me with thy speech
While up to thee my wistful sense I reach.

In life's bewildering strife and care-fraught
I love to muse of thy sweet gentleness:
But in the peace and solace of this hush
"Strengthen and soothe me with thy tenderness;
Give to me what thou will: here at thy side,
Whate'er it be, I shall be satisfied.

In a late paper you counsel kindly treatment of those differing with us on the great questions of Ontology, Soteriology, and Eschatology, as these questions are undergoing thorough investigations such as they have never received before in the world's history. This is really true, as I know from my various reading on religious subjects. I am glad you counsel moderation, as we were so lately under the same delusions. Five years ago I would have believed any person a heretic who would have denied the everlasting punishment of the wicked, and by the wicked was understood those who refused to join the church and come under its teachings upon such and when by reading the books of Pettingell and Drummond, and other writers who clearly present the true meaning of the Scriptures on these subjects, and show how false meanings have been put on plain words, I acknowledge I was myself so overwhelmed by the subject in its clearness, as presented to my mind, that it nearly dethroned my reason for a length of time. But now that my mind has got settled I feel to thank my Heavenly Father that my eyes have been opened, and I can view God as a Father and Christ as a loving Savior, who was appointed by the Heavenly Father to redeem me from death, even at the cost of his life. Oh, what love had the Father for his erring children that he gave them his only begotten Son to die that we might live!

It is life from the dead he purchased for us, not merely life from misery, but life from the death which the old subtle serpent brought upon us by leading us astray from the counsels of the Heavenly Father, by assuring us that we should live eternally in sin and opposition to God's assurance that we should surely die if we disobeyed his words.

To my mind the matter is now so plain that I wonder how any one can be deceived in regard to it, and my dear aged friend, I am satisfied that all that is necessary is to get the truth before the minds of intelligent men and women to convince them that the old Catholic dogma of eternal suffering is a fallacy and quite contrary to the plain teaching of Scripture from its beginning to its end.

So let us, as you advise, be kind and Christian in our treatment of those who have not had a chance to receive the light; for the light if we can get it before them will certainly make them free. But it is hard to get it before them, as the old creeds and the old teachers who are hidebound by the creeds, will not let the light of truth reach their people, but let us wait with patience God's time.

The dry bones are beginning to shake, and ere long they will come bone to bone. I am satisfied the clouds are scattering and the sun is breaking through. Let us be patient.

I want to write a short letter about the few of the One Faith in this place. I am very glad you have sent me the paper so long without the pay. I am going to work for the paper in earnest. I have a poor way to get the truth before the people—financially—but I am talking of the truths your paper advocates all the time. The truth is on the advance in this County. Brother S. T. Hook was the first to help us revive and organize into a band of workers, and oh, how we love Brother Hook. The outside world want him to come again.

Since Brother Hook held his discussion here this fall, two of the leading Campbellites have deserted the band of so-called Christians, as though no one was worthy of the name Christian but them. The world of professed Christians are asking "Where is the promise of his coming?"

Let us who are of the light look well to the interest of those who are in the dark, for darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people. Oh, hasten the time when all will know the Lord, from the least to the greatest; when there will be one King, and his name one, when the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea.

Your brother in hope of the soon coming kingdom.

THE RESTITUTION is a very welcome visitor. I like the doctrine it advocates. I ponder its pages over and over again, and hand it to my neighbors whom I think will read it. It is all the preaching I have. I am poor in this world's goods, but thank God I can read and think for myself. I will try and pay up soon.

We once numbered about one hundred and were a united body, but one came into our midst in sheep's clothing and caused division in the church, and it went down. Some went back to the world, some to infidelity; a few hold out faithful.

I wish to say through your most excellent paper, that if any one comes this way and will stop and preach for us, to correspond with me at the above address.

I was sorry to hear of our beloved Brother A. B. Magruder's death, but sorrow not as those without hope.

Your brother in hope of the resurrection to life eternal.

I want to write a few lines to let you know that I love THE RESTITUTION, and it has been the means of saving me. I was a Bible reader for years, but I did not understand it. I am glad to see the paper every week; it always has some good news to me of the Dear Redeemer and his promises. How I wish I could help to send it to the poor, for I am one of them, and it does me so much good. Brother Chaplin has endeared himself to me very much through the mediumship of the paper, and I [illegible] the blessings of [illegible] upon him.

I see by the tag on my paper that my subscription has run out, therefore I must renew, or else I will have no claim on the paper. I never have let it run by more than a week. If my memory serves me right, since I commenced taking the paper, and that is quite a good many years. I began taking it before it was called THE RESTITUTION, and think every one who possibly can, should renew as soon as their time is out. I must say that I esteem the paper very highly. Do not know how I would get along without it, as I am alone here, and hear no preaching or religious instruction that suits me, except what I get through THE RESTITUTION and that sure word, the Bible.

Brethren, our time is short; let us be up and doing while the day lasts. I cannot get any new subscribers, but I will send two dollars and direct what to do with it. I for one would live and dress rather poorly before I would do without my paper. I am well aware there are many too poor to pay that ought to have the paper furnished free and with a free will, also.

I send with this four dollars, two for for my own paper, and for the other two send to two others for six months each.

Your brother in hope,

I herein send one dollar to apply on my subscription. I can no more think of doing without the paper than I can without my victuals. It is all the preaching I have. THE RESTITUTION and my Bible are all I have to cheer me on my lonely way. Through its columns and what I could read in my Bible to my husband whom I married over a year ago, I converted him to the truth. My name was Elizabeth Tinkey for thirty-eight years. Some of the readers of THE RESTITUTION will remember me, as I have met for worship with some of them, but I have no such enjoyment now. We went over the Millerton, and Brother Moore helped my husband to put on Christ in Gospel order. There we met several brethren we had never seen before and some we had worshipped with years ago. Our hearts were made glad to see these brethren and sisters, to again mingle our voices in songs of praise and gratitude to our Heavenly Father for his blessings to us. It was a happy meeting for us, as my husband had never heard gospel preaching before. I have stood alone in the faith, with the sects all around me, for five years. Brother Ramsay made us a visit and gave a few discourses to the sects and put them on the search. If any of the brethren come this way we would be glad to have them call. We live sixteen miles northwest of Ottawa, the nearest R. R. station. Address us at Centropolis, Kan.

I am spared to write to you again by the hand of a friend and sister. I have had a very sick spell recently. I am in hopes that God will raise me up once more, but not my will but God's be done. I cannot send you any money this month as I hoped to do, but I am trusting God to provide enough so I can send some soon. THE RESTITUTION has been a great help to me and a comfort in our lonely pilgrimage. It is a source of consolation to see the testimonies of those of the gospel faith. I have not had the blessing of meeting with any of God's servants in over thirty years. If some one could come here and preach I think he could get a good hearing. The people seem willing to hear what I have been able to tell them. Those whom I can get to read the paper are too poor to subscribe for it, nevertheless, if my health will permit, I will try and get some three month subscribers. We beg your prayers, and when you meet together to enjoy God's presence, don't forget the lonely ones.

I have waited to acknowledge the receipt of two numbers of the 16th ult., of what I regard after a study (like Timothy of the Bible from boyhood) the best and ablest Bible journal and weekly advocate of the gospel of Jesus the Christ in the world, until I could answer with at least one new subscriber, and in my effort to extend its circulation have succeeded in getting a subscriber, whom I have every reason to believe will be delighted with the Bible instruction which fills its columns, and will likely aid in extending its circulation. The subscriber is a Baptist preacher of high standing. He is a man of fine intellect, like myself in advanced years, and though we differ upon different points, yet he belongs to the Baptists whose faith in 1600 had the same doctrines as you and I do now. I have no doubt he will be delighted with THE RESTITUTION, and when the three months' subscription is out will gladly renew his subscription. Sister Reed's article on the death of Vanderbilt is much prized. I shall continue trying to get more subscribers to the good journal of the church of God. With thanksgiving and praises to our great God of love and mercy for his preservation of you, dear brother, and your coadjutors in the good work of disseminating through THE RESTITUTION the glad tidings of the kingdom of God in the name of our Lord and Savior Jesus the Christ, I remain with cheering hopes of the near approach of the kingdom of God and the resurrection of those that sleep in the dust of the earth. Yours in faith and hope,

Prayer—Its Mysterious Answers. Petitioners—Paul and Jesus.

Sometimes the Master doesn't give us what we want; but he gives the spirit to them that ask of him. There was an old man—such an one as Paul the aged—a poor man, often beaten with stripes, a homeless wanderer, of keen and sensitive organization, who had to go away and leave others to reap where he had sown. Inconceivable were his labors and hardships; and at last, in old age, he found himself utterly alone, Demas having forsaken him, and only one, Luke, the beloved physician, with him. Such an one, with inward troubles, came to have a thorn in the flesh. I do not know what it was, but some form of infirmity, a short-sightedness, perhaps, which made it difficult to see the people he was preaching to. I know not what it was; but Paul wanted to get rid of it, and he prayed, not once, but thrice, that the thorn might be taken away from him; he prayed for an answer and waited patiently; but no answer; he prayed again and again, more earnestly, and the answer came; yet the prayer was not granted. But it gave him such increase of motive and faith, such blessed moments of intercourse with God, such a sense of the divine reality, that he burst forth himself into ecstasy, saying that he would rather suffer adversity that the power of Christ might rest upon him; "For when I am weak, then am I strong." He had overestimated his powers, his sovereign ability, his exalted faculty of penetrating to the hearts of people and pointing them to Christ; but in one revelation the whole of his self-adulation was smitten away, and then it was: "Not me, but Christ in me; for when I am weak, then am I strong!"

To all those who are weary and heavy-laden, to those who think God does not hear nor answer their prayers, to all those who are in danger of turning away disconsolate from the throne of grace, there is the figure in Gethsemane of one, who in his hour of trial, turns aside and withdraws himself from his beloved friends. He does not like to feel that he is going beyond the reach of them and their sympathy, yet he wants to be alone—as do we in our terrible moments; but, not to be without the reach of human sympathy, we ask our friends to watch with us, if nothing more; and such an one knelt down, and, controlling the agonies of his body, he prayed: "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not my will, but thy will be done." Taking the two poles of prayer—what man wants and prays for, and what God sees fit to give—the soul of man under the limitations of his humanity, and all the controlling ways and molding power of God coming out of its darkness into marvelous light, he could say: "If it be possible let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not my will, but thy will be done." And his sweat was as great drops of blood falling down to the ground. Will you have the blasphemy to say that such a prayer was not heard because it was not granted? The better prayer of Jesus not granted! The cry of the King was not met by being granted. The cup did not pass away; nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt! Then there came the answer. An angel from Heaven came to strengthen him when the prayer was not granted—an everlasting lesson for all those who are following in his footsteps, and for all those who are weary and heavy-laden. "Come, thou who are weary and heavy-laden," he said, "and I will give thee rest."—From a Sermon by H. R. Haweis, in Independent.

The Jews of Tunis.

Tunis, which occupies the site of ancient Carthage, is not altogether unworth of this distinction. It is a city of considerable size, possessing a population of 120,000. Of this number 40,000 are Jews, but it is impossible to estimate the Jewish population of the whole country. At what period the Jews first settled in the country cannot be correctly stated. About a century ago the Government appropriated the ancient burial ground, and the bones were removed by the Jews to another place, but the grave stones were destroyed. Thus the only records that might have thrown any light on the antiquity of the Jewish settlements were suffered to perish. There still remain three graves on this ground with stones. One marks the resting place of Rabbi Darmon, and it is a popular belief that human force will never remove it from its place. It dates, however, only about a century back. There is a tradition among the Jews that their ancestors first settled in Tunis in the third century of the Mohammedan era, when a street named Kern was assigned to them for their exclusive habitation. This was a kind of Ghetto, being furnished with gates, which were closed during the night. It is still largely inhabited by Jews, but they are not now restricted to this place.

Previous to the reign of the present Pasha the condition of the Jews was wretched and deplorable in the extreme. They were subjected to intolerable persecution and held to extreme degradation. With the accession of the present ruler their condition changed. They were restored by him to the full liberties of citizens, and they are at this day on an equal footing with the rest of the population. Some traces of their former condition are still to be met with among the poorer classes in their habits and mode of living. Their houses are built mostly in the old style, being low buildings with small windows, and white-washed walls. The artisans and mechanics do their work in the street, and sell their goods in the same place. Only the richer class possess workshops and stores. The European residents are supplied with all they require by the Jews, who provide for them the goods at a cheaper rate than others.

The Jewish women mostly do not possess any education, being in this respect like the majority of their sex in all Eastern countries; they are never seen in business, being constantly confined to the house. The women of the richer class only occupy their time with needlework, weaving, spinning, and other domestic work for which they have been specially educated. As in other countries the Jews are divided into two communities, here called Sephardim and "Africans." The former are by far the better class. They occupy their spare time in Rabbinic studies, being generally well educated. The latter class are Jews who have come to the country from Egypt, Algiers, and other African countries, and are markedly inferior in respect of education to their Sephardic co-religionists. Both these classes are extremely conservative in their religious usages. The influence of the French, however, has begun to show itself of recent years, and European manners and education are now slowly making their way among the wealthier Jews in the country.—Scribner.

DIED.

HARLAN.—Sept. 23, 1885, of neuralgia of the stomach, Susie Harlan, wife of Silas W. Harlan, of Vincent, Neb., aged 30 years, 11 months, and 25 days.

Sister Harlan was born in Ohio, Sept. 20, 1854. Later on she removed with her parents to Hardin Co., Iowa, where she was married to Silas W. Harlan, Aug. 23, 1872. Sister Harlan was baptized by G. M. Myers in the year 1877, and from that time until her death she lived a devoted and consistent Christian life. She was loved and respected by all who knew her, and was always striving in some way to forward the cause of truth. Her work was always done in such away as to command the respect of all. The church has sustained an irreparable loss, but we sorrow not as others that have no hope. She died in the full hope of a soon coming Savior to raise her to an immortal life. She leaves a husband and one daughter, and a large circle of friends to mourn her loss.

The writer spoke words of comfort to a large circle of friends and relatives, at the residence of the deceased's brother-in-law, H. B. Cramer, predicated on that portion of Scripture found in Rom. vi. 2–12. The body was then taken to Iowa, for interment at the parental home. Under the trees in the yard where seats had been prepared the writer again spoke words of comfort to a large concourse of friends and relatives, predicated upon 1 Cor. xv. 21–28. The body was then interred in the Shepherd Cemetery, where it now rests awaiting the coming of the Blessed Master to restore it to Life Eternal.

In the evening after the funeral we spoke at the Gifford Hall, to a large congregation. Subject, the Christian's Hope. We believe that many were made to see that hope must necessarily be based upon a promise, and without a promise there can be no hope. Conclusion, man's duty then rests in determining what God has promised and base his hope thereon. Our brother then took us to Bro. J. Cady's and on Sunday at his school house we delivered two discourses to moderate congregations. Bro. Cady lives two and a half miles west of Hubbard. Here is an organized body of a few souls that is operating a Sunday School, and working with a zeal that is highly commendable. We returned to Gifford on Monday, and Tuesday evening preached our farewell discourse to a full house. We saw many familiar faces in the congregation, and perhaps some we shall never behold again. O, how we would rejoice as we told them if we could clasp immortal hands with them in the kingdom.

Yours, in the blessed Hope.

ALMUS ADAMS.

ROOT.—At Rootville, Crawford Co., Pa., Dec. 30, 1885, of bilious fever and pneumonia of the lungs, Mary Jane Root, aged 57 years.

Sister Root and her husband were baptized by the writer some 25 years ago. She has ever since been a strong believer in the glorious truths of the restitution, and fell asleep in the hope of a speedy resurrection. As the writer was away at the time of her demise, Brethren Smith and Newel Wood of East Branch officiated at the funeral. Brother Smith spoke from the words of our Savior recorded by John xi. 25. Our sister with whom we have associated in past years, has closed her confession to the truth and warning to her neighbors in the prayer and conference meeting; but her work is done. May the writer, with those who have met her in fellowship, meet her again in the morning. "She sleeps, but not forever." JOHN T. ONGLEY.

The church of God at Cleveland, O., will hold meetings at 10:30 a. m. every Sunday (D. V.) in Blood and Keller's Block, Room 36, 676½ Ontario Street, Corner of Bolivar, north of Central Market. Brethren from abroad of like faith and all searchers after truth are welcome

THE COMING AGE,

—1878—

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WEETHEE.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence, it treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the character of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar lessons, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE the product of laborious research, covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents indeed clear consistent views with acceptance and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are at or at hand.

Indeed it tells us concerning the Christian Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the dictates of the Unconquerable Will. Wherever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

The Prophetic Call of the Watchmen of Israel.

Howbeit that is not first which is spiritual but that which is natural then that which is spiritual).

I am not come to destroy the law and the prophets but to (still them. 1 Cor. 15-46.

All natural prophecies (by this is meant all that can be fulfilled in a literal manner in contradistinction to symbolic language in prophecy) must be fulfilled in the order that Paul shews unto us, First, that which is natural then that which is spiritual. Under this order Jesus Christ fulfilled all things written concerning him. "O foolish men and slow of heart to believe after all that the prophets have spoken. Behooved it not the Christ to suffer these things and to enter into his glory. And beginning from Moses and from all the prophets he interpreted to them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself. And he said unto them, These are my words which I spake unto you while I was yet with you how that all things must needs be fulfilled which are written in the law of Moses and the prophets and the Psalms concerning me. Then opened he their mind that they might understand the Scriptures.

And he said unto them, Thus it is written that the Christ should suffer and rise again from the dead the third day and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name unto all nations beginning from Jerusalem. Ye are witnesses of these things. And behold I send forth the promise of my Father upon you, but tarry ye in the city until ye be endued with power from on high. Luke 24: "Search the Scriptures for in them ye think ye have eternal life and they are they which testify of me."

We can trace through all the Scriptures types, shadows and prophecies of our adorable Lord the Savior of man.

We trace his genealogy from the house of David, through his two sons Solomon and Nathan, where they met in Zerubbabel the type of Christ, his lineage through Mary who was of the house of David united in marriage to Joseph of the same house and tribe and family, as we are told "they performed all things according to the law of the Lord." See Num. last chapter. Joseph thus becoming the legal father of Jesus, while he himself was the only begotten of the Father as he declared of himself that, A greater than Solomon was here, thus becoming ever in the days of his flesh David's son and David's Lord. The calling out of Egypt, type of the bondage of corruption, from which the spiritual sons of God hope to escape to an incorruptible inheritance. Space would fail me to tell of the fulfilling of all prophecies literally by our Lord. These I note, for they have been questioned and denied.

Says Jesus, These things have I spoken to you in proverbs, the hour cometh when I shall no more speak to you in proverbs but shall tell you plainly of the Father. In that day ye shall ask in my name, and I say not unto you that I will pray the Father for you for the Father himself loveth you because ye have loved me and have believed that I came forth from the Father. I came out from the Father and am come into the world, again I leave the world to go unto the Father. His disciples say, Lo now speakest thou plainly and speakest no proverb. Now know we that thou knowest all things and needest not that any man should ask thee, by this we believe that thou camest forth from God. Jesus answers the 4, Do ye now believe, I have got many things to say unto you but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit (the same word that our text begins with).

Howbeit when he, the spirit of truth, is come, he shall guide you into all the truth for he shall not speak from himself but whatsoever things he shall hear these shall he speak and he shall declare unto you the things that are to come. He shall glorify me, for he shall take of mine and declare it unto you. John 16

And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self with the glory which I had with thee before the world was. I manifest thy name unto the men whom thou gavest me out of the world, thine they were and thou gavest them to me and they have kept thy word. Now they know that all things whatsoever thou hast given me are from thee, for the words which thou gavest me I have given unto them and they received them and know of a truth that I come forth from thee and they believed that thou didst send me. I pray for them."

It is not difficult to see the natural and the spiritual fulfillment of the prophecy.

As witness the natural Babylon and mystery Babylon the great. Natural Sodom and Egypt and spiritual Sodom and Egypt of the revelation of Jesus Christ. Isaac represents the seed of promise which seed is Christ.

Hagar, who personates Mt. Sinai. The law of literal Jews and the Jerusalem that now is, for she is in bondage with her children. Sarah, who personates Mt. Zion at Jerusalem. "But the Jerusalem that is above is free which is our mother." "Now we brethren as Isaac was, are children of promise, which things are an allegory," says Paul.

While these were actual places and persons first, they were afterward used in spiritual things in an allegorical character. Now these things happened unto them by way of figure, and they were written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the ages are come; wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth (Thou shalt stand in the lot at the end of the days. Dan.) take heed lest he fall. There hath no temptation taken you but such as man can bear, but God is faithful who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able to bear, but will with the temptation make also the way of escape, that ye may be able to endure it, wherefore, my beloved, flee from idolatry, I speak as to wise men.

But now apart from the law a righteousness of God hath been manifested being witnessed by the law and the prophets even the righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ unto all them that believe.

All the disciples of Jesus witness to the truth of the fulfilling of these things in Jesus of Nazareth in a literal or natural manner.

"Cry out and shout thou inhabitant of Zion for great is the Holy One in the midst of thee."

In the calling out of the Ecclesia, the Christ body, we find a spiritual signification in the prophecies. The word of God is the sword of the spirit, in these we discern a second or double application of the oracles of God. "These things are a figure and they were written for our admonition upon whom the ends of the ages are come." After the memorable "midst of the years made known in wrath remember mercy" when Jesus "came not to destroy the law and the prophets but to fulfill them" in his birth, life, death burial and resurrection, then Paul could assure the body of Christ the Ecclesia. "Ye are come unto Mt. Zion and unto the city of the living God the heavenly Jerusalem, preaching the mystery of the Gospel to those who are not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, to the Jew first and also to the Greek. For therein is revealed a righteousness of God from faith unto faith as it is written. But the righteous shall live from faith."

But to speak of the subject matter, The watchman's call, Habakkuk, O Lord how long shall I cry and thou wilt not hear me, even cry out unto thee of violence and thou wilt not save. Why dost thou show me iniquity and cause me to behold grievance for spoiling and violence are before me and there are that raise up strife and contention. Therefore the law is slacked and judgment doth never go forth for the wicked doth compass about the righteous, therefore wrong judgment proceedeth. Behold ye among the heathen and regard and wonder marvelously for I will work a work in your days which ye will not believe though it be told you, (read the whole chapter) I will stand upon my watch and set me upon the tower, and will watch to see what he will say unto me, and what I shall answer when I am argued with. (Margin.) And the Lord answered me and said, Write the vision and make it plain upon tables (of their heart) that he may run that readeth it. (The name of the Lord is a strong tower the righteous runneth into it and is safe. Rev.) Yet for an appointed time but at the end it shall speak and not lie, though it tarry wait for it because it will surely come, it will not tarry. Behold his soul is lifted up is not upright in him, but the just shall live by his faith." Except the Lord build the house they labor in vain that are builders of it in it, except the Lord keep the city the watchmen watch in vain.

After the Jews returned from their captivity at Babylon, with instructions to restore and build Jerusalem and the temple at Mt. Zion, and repair the breaches of the wall that was broken down. This last work was done under Nehemiah the Tirshatha—70 years were fulfilled in captivity, and some time was occupied in building and repairing, so that it was 445 years B. C. before the commandment came to Nehemiah to finish the great work, from this date the prophecy begins. Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city, to finish thy transgression and to make an end of sins and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness and to seal up the vision and prophecy and to anoint the Most Holy. Know, therefore, and understand that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince, shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks, the streets shall be built again and the wall even in troublous times. 62 weeks and 7 weeks equal 483 years, which reach to A. D. 28, when Jesus was anointed Prince by the descent of the Holy Spirit upon him as he emerged from the waters of Jordan. "Suffer it to be so now for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness," was his reply to the objections of John the Baptist.

Then comes the ever memorable week of years, when Jesus the Son of God and Son of man, was tried, tempted, rejected, mocked and crucified, was buried and rose from the dead, ascended into heaven. The outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon his followers, and the miraculous conversion of Saul of Tarsus, the preaching of the word and way of life to the Jews, which ends the 70 weeks determined upon the people. According to Ezekiel's prophesy he was to bear the iniquity of Judah 40 years. This he did after his rejection and the doom was averted until the year A. D. 70. This was the sign of Jonah to them. Repent for yet 40 years and Jerusalem shall be destroyed.

And after three score and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off and shall have nothing (or) and they shall be no more his people (margin). And the Messiah's future people (margin) shall come and destroy the city and the sanctuary (spiritual sense the natural came first) and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined. 62 weeks 434 years, plus 70 equals 504 years, A. D., at which time the church had forgotten her Lord and his kingdom in striving after kingly power for herself, and shortly after she became mystery Babylon the Great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth.

And he shall confirm the covenant with many for a week, (the 70th week) and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate even until the consummation and that determined shall be poured upon the desolator. This covenant was confirmed by Jesus with his followers at his first advent and by the coming of the "Comforter the Spirit of truth." The desolation continued for centuries. For the children of Judah have done evil in my sight saith the Lord, they have set their abominations in the house which is called by my name; to pollute it. This is a nation that obeyeth not the voice of the Lord their God nor receiveth correction; truth is perished and is cut off from their mouth. Will ye come and stand before me in this house which is called by my name and say we are delivered to do all these abominations? Is this house which is called by my name become a den of robbers in your eyes? Behold I have seen it. Scest thou not what they do in the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem. The children gather wood and the fathers kindle the fire and the women knead their dough to make cakes to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink offerings unto other gods that they may provoke me to anger. Jer. 7. - (We are strongly reminded in this prophesy of the holy waters of Papacy which they offer to the queen of heaven). Shall I not visit for these things saith the Lord and shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this? Go ye up upon her walls and destroy but not make a full end; take away her battlements for they are not the Lord's. For the house of Israel and the house of Judah have dealt very treacherously against me saith the Lord. They have belied the Lord and said it is not he neither shall evil come upon us, neither shall we see sword or famine, and the prophets shall become wind and the word is not in them. Thus shall it be done to them. Wherefore thus saith the Lord God of hosts, Because ye speak this word behold I will make my words in thy mouth fire and this people wood, and it shall devour them. Jer. 4

This is the position taken by a large class of Christians of today.

Wherefore hear the word of the Lord ye scornful men that rule this people which is in Jerusalem. Because ye have said we have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at agreement; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through it shall not come unto us, for we have made lies our refuge and under falsehood have we hid ourselves. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation stone a tried stone a precious corner stone a sure foundation, he that believeth shall not make haste. Judgment also will I lay to the line and righteousness to the plummet, and the hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies and the waters shall overflow the hiding place, and your covenant with death shall be disannulled, and your agreement with hell shall not stand, when the overflowing scourge shall pass through ye shall be trodden down by it. From the time that it goeth forth it shall take you for morning by morning shall it pass over, by day and by night, and it shall be a vexation only when he shall make you to understand doctrine (margin). For the bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself on it and the covering narrower than that he can wrap himself in it. For the Lord shall rise up, he shall be wroth, that he may do his strange work and bring to pass his act, his strange act. Now therefore be ye not mockers lest your bands be made strong, for I have heard from the Lord God of hosts a consumption even determined upon the whole earth. Isa. 28. For the Lord God of hosts shall make a consumption even determined in the midst of all the land. For yet a very little while and the indignation shall cease, and mine anger in their destruction. And it shall come to pass in that day that the remnant of Israel and such as are escaped of the house of Jacob shall no more again stay upon him that smote them, but shall stay upon the Lord the Holy One of Israel in truth. The remnant shall return even the remnant of Jacob unto the mighty God. For though thy people Israel be as the sand of the sea a remnant among them shall return, the consumption decreed shall overflow in righteousness, and it shall come to pass in that day that his burden shall be removed from thy shoulder and his yoke from off thy neck and the yoke shall be destroyed because of the anointing. Isa. 10.

Then I heard one saint speaking and another saint said unto the numberer of secrets, the wonderful numberer which spake, (margin) How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice and the transgression of desolation to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot. And he said unto me Unto 2300 days. Then shall the sanctuary be cleansed. Dan. 8.

This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones to the intent that the living may know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will and setteth up over it the basest of men. Let his heart be changed from man's and let a beast's heart be given unto him, and let seven times pass over him. Dan. 4. E. K. HOLT.

Are Railroads a Subject of Prophecy?

They are [illegible] inably expected that some reference would be made to them by the Hebrew Prophets.

The most clear and distinct description of what seems to me the construction of a railroad is in the fifth chapter of the book Baruch, an Apocryphical book. If it foretells the construction of a railway, it demonstrates that it is an inspired book.

And one thing should be kept in mind, every description of this road, so far as I know, is interwoven with the time of restoration and forgiveness of the tribes of Israel and the end of their dispensation.

"Put off, O Jerusalem, the garments of thy mourning and affliction, and put on the comliness of the glory that cometh from God forever.

"Cast about thee a double garment of the righteousness that cometh from God, and set a diadem on thy head of the glory of the Everlasting.

"For God will show thy brightness unto every country under heaven. For thy name shall be called of God forever the peace of righteousness and the glory of God's worship.

"Arise, O Jerusalem, and stand on high and look about toward the east and behold thy children gathered from the west unto the east by the word of the Holy One, rejoicing in the remembrance of God. For they departed from thee on foot and were led away of their enemies but God bringeth them unto thee exalted with glory as children of the kingdom. For God hath appointed that every high hill and banks of long continuance should be cast down, and valleys filled up to make even the ground that Israel may go safely in the glory of God," etc.

Isa. 40 chap.:—"Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people, saith the Lord.

"Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem and cry unto her that her warfare is accomplished that her iniquity is pardoned. For she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins.

The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our Lord"

What kind of a highway?

"Every valley shall be exalted and every mountain and hill shall be made low, and the crooked shall be made straight and the rough places plain.

And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed and all flesh shall see it together."

John's mission was ended by his being beheaded. The revelation of that glory is yet future.

In connection with the second coming of the Redeemer to Zion the prophet says:

"Arise, shine for the light is come and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee.

For behold darkness shall cover the earth and gross darkness the people, but the Lord shall arise upon thee and his glory shall be seen upon thee.

And the Gentiles shall come to thy light and kings to the brightness of thy rising."

This is at the end of the transformation.

"Lift up thine eyes round about and see all they gather themselves together, they come to thee, thy sons shall come from afar and thy daughters shall be nursed at thy side," etc.

The prophecies of past fulfillment have been fulfilled in the obvious and common sense understanding of prophetic language.

If any prophecy could have been expected to be fulfilled in a mystical and figurative way, it was the prophecy of Jesus the King, riding into Jerusalem on an unbroken colt. Yet it was fulfilled in harmony with the plain and obvious language in which it was given.

It is a sad fact that the Christian dispensation has been one of apostasy. Where the apostles preached and planted churches, is missionary field today, and the apostacies from the Christian churches into spiritualism have, perhaps, been as numerous as the conversions in heathen lands from the painful self-denying labors of our faithful missionaries.

But the church was for[illegible] this sad fact in Christian[illegible]

If thou put the brethren in remembrance of these things thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ. C. B.

A New Year's Greeting.

To the dear ones of like precious faith wherever the Lord has placed them, we send you a happy New Years' greeting, praying the giver of all good that in the new book of life that has just opened before us, we may keep each page clean and pure from any blot or stain, not only trying to make our own hearthstones brighter, our own heart's altars purer, but letting the radiance of a better life shed its light into other hearts and homes, working not for self but for the best interests of the truth wherever we have an opportunity.

I was thinking today of the arduous tasks which must of necessity be imposed upon those who are striving so hard to keep THE RESTITUTION before the people, and right here may be the beginning of work for the cause of truth. Few of the brethren realize how much they might do to lighten the burden of care resting upon those faithful workers in THE RESTITUTION office. The paper is now $300 in debt, and this might all be erased at the end of this year, if we, each one, to a man, will make an extra effort in this direction. A few shillings here, a few dollars from those more prosperous in this world's goods, to send the paper to some invalid or friend, a little more diligence from each minister of the gospel to carry the paper into their congregations, a little more system, organization and method, and at the end of the year THE RESTITUTION will be laid in hundreds of homes where the light of truth has never before entered. In this way the debt may be canceled, the price of the paper, perhaps, reduced, and all be made happy. Let us work to that end, brethren and sisters, not only in Michigan but in every State of this Union, and then we can say in our hearts we have done what we could for His cause, have brightened some homes, lightened some hearts, and God only knows how many may be saved at His coming by our faithfulness. In view of the brevity of human life and the little time allotted us to work, let us be diligent in every walk of life so if we are called to our test ere this year shall close, we can say, with honest hearts, Lord I have done the best that I could, and when the angels who guard God's great balance shall look upon the scales of our life, our works may not be weighed and found wanting, but we may be accepted in His sight, is the prayer of your servant in the cause of truth.

B. W. WOODWARD.

P. S.—Wife and I have been holding meetings near Moline, for two weeks back, with the best results. The people declared they never heard the Bible preached before so they could understand it. Three baptisms was the immediate result of these meetings, and many more are almost persuaded to embrace the good news of the gospel of the kingdom.

Editor Restitution:

I am very glad that you are still to be the head of the paper, for under your leadership I think that it improves with every issue. May God grant that you shall long serve us as a body in this capacity, as I think you will be the means of leading many to righteousness.

As the brethren have heard nothing from this locality for some time, I will say a few words to let them know that the work still goes on[illegible]

[illegible] evening there were two appointments filled, one at the Scott school house, on Rock prairie, and the other in the town of Everton. This was more than we had bargained for, and was occasioned by not knowing whether we could get the house where we preached last winter, and if not we were to preach at Everton, and as arrangements had been made at both places, and neither withdrawn, we thought it best, as there were two speakers, to fill both appointments; Bro. Elon to preach at Scott and the writer at Everton. There was some opposition, as there always is, but not of a very serious nature. The weather was real nice and the attendance large, and Bro. Elon and myself believe that with fourteen years experience, in teaching the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, we have never seen a more lively interest manifested by any people than we saw there. We had the pleasure of immersing Mrs. Myers into the saving name of Christ. She is in His care and keeping. That she may keep His word unto the end, and receive a crown of life, is the prayer of your Bro. in Christ.

JAMES BUTT.

P. S.—Will meet at the same place about the same time this year.

Having just returned from a meeting held in Salamanca, N. Y., at which a few became very much interested, saying that they never heard the Scriptures made so plain before, that a child might understand, and although infidelity and spiritualism with them was prominent, yet had to acknowledge, that in all our Lectures on the prophecies of the Old and New Testaments we sustained our first text, "What is truth," and the answer, "Thy word is Truth." Some I think will yet make a stand for the truth by obedience, and Bro. J. B. Lent and family no longer have to stand alone in that large town. On arriving home found that our Sister Root of this neighborhood had been laid away to rest.

Yours in the blessed hope.

HOW WE LEARN.

Great truths are rarely bought. The common truth,
Both as men live and take from day to day,
Comes in the common walk of easy life,
Blown by the careless wind across our way.

Bought in the market at their usual price,
Held in the smile, the look, persuasive the bowl,
It tells no tales of daring or of work,
Nor pleases even the restless of a soul.

Great truths are greatly won and fought by those,
Who waited on the breath of powers [illegible]
Engrossed in the great struggle of the hour—
Held buffeting with extreme wind and storm—

Not in the general mart—bold men and true,
Not in the mint-house of gold sovereigns,
Not in the world's gay hall of rout and revel
Nor amid the pleasant haunts of men,

But in the day of trial, and grief,
When the strong hand of God puts forth its might Wrought by the ordeal of the emperor's sword,
And bringe from the furnace it is cast in—the light

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST IN RELATION TO ISRAEL.

I have been requested to speak on this occasion upon the second coming of Christ as related to Israel. By way of introduction, I may say, that Israel, the seed of Abraham according to the flesh, is a type of the second advent. By this it is meant that the history of Israel from the beginning with Abraham, their condition as they now stand to-day, as a people, as prophesy thus, that the Jews [illegible] Israel will verify some again in the very same literal manner as the first time in the flesh. As the earth, and exalted from Mt. Olivet to the right hand of God. And the argument for us this day

We open the Bible and we find [illegible] from the beginning until now [illegible] been predicted long before it happened; and everything that has been [illegible] concerning them while in their [illegible] from God by [illegible] in the past and present, all those concerning the first advent of Israel's Messiah, have been fulfilled literally, so shall those which remain, concerning the coming of Messiah to reign, be fulfilled in like manner? I see not how any can escape the argument. As surely as Israel has been scattered, so surely shall they be converted and restored. As surely as their Messiah came once literally, as surely shall he come again literally. As it was predicted that he should do the work of a priest here on the earth in offering sacrifice for sin, and as he fulfilled these predictions literally when he offered himself up for the sins of men; so since it is predicted that he shall also reign—not come there far away in the heavens, but here on the earth—and the throne of his father David; why must not this be fulfilled in a manner just as literal as the rest? As the type of Aaron was fulfilled here on earth in literal, visible priesthood, so must the type of David also have a fulfillment in literal, visible manifestation of Christ the King. But in order for this, Jesus must come again in the same manner as he was seen to go." In any one in doubt whether these words will be fulfilled literally? I point him to the Jews. It is [illegible] every Jew you meet, is looking, living, unanswerable proof that the prophecies are fulfilled with them to the letter literally and visibly. In all the long trail of ages which attests Israel's history as the nation present to us [illegible] fulfilled a single one of the [illegible] literally bear the [illegible] strongest. For [illegible] things strange indeed [illegible] cannot change this"

And then, in addition to all this [illegible] all these Jewish Rabbis [illegible] Messiah shall put on [illegible] mortal, and not as said would [illegible] of the coming of the Lord [illegible] they [illegible] Christ shall [illegible] in the coming in [illegible] unanswerable evidence [illegible] fact, we might naturally suppose [illegible] the second coming of our Lord [illegible] already be connected [illegible]

Still, however probable it might seem, these indications alone might not be regarded [illegible] settling the question whether the advent of our Lord is to be expected to connection with the restoration of Israel. But to prophesy before it is yet more explicit. In the trumpet song of chap. xxvii. we are told that in the coming day when that [illegible] shall be [illegible] the land of Judah, the Lord will [illegible] especial care of them. Besides [illegible] there are so many words by the apostle Paul, that the time when these words shall be fulfilled, is the time of the resurrection of the just. Nothing could be more explicit than the language. When this expression of Jesus [illegible] mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." But the time when the dead shall put on immortality, as Paul tells us, would be at the coming of the Lord [illegible] Christ shall [illegible] in the coming in [illegible] unanswerable evidence [illegible] fact, we might naturally suppose [illegible] the second coming of our Lord [illegible] already be connected [illegible]

How could language be plainer? Here we are expressly told that at the time of Israel's final conversion, Israel's Redeemer shall come to Zion.

A spiritual coming, will any one say? Let it be remembered that we have already seen that at the same time, according to Isaiah and Paul, shall occur the resurrection of the just. If so, then the coming of Israel's Redeemer which shall take place at the same time cannot be spiritual, but must be that personal, visible return in glory by which, as all the apostles teach us, the resurrection will be ushered in.

III. If Isaiah's testimony still leaves any doubt as to the close connection in time of the conversion of Israel with the second advent and the resurrection of the just, let us hear the word of another prophet. In Dan. xii. 1, 2, we have the following prediction:—"At that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even till that same time; and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book." Here let it be observed, before proceeding to the next verse, that there is no question as to who Daniel's people were. Daniel's people were the Jews. Nor can there be any doubt as to what primarily is intended by the deliverance of which we read. For this deliverance must have reference to the affliction and captivity of which we read so much in preceding chapters as affection sometimes in the personal oppression of Daniel's people under the yoke of the Gentile. Neither can it possibly refer there to anything prior to the restoration from Babylon, for to the days of the relief of the Jews from the tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes. For it is expressly said that the time of that deliverance shall be a time of trouble, such as never there had been since there was a nation. But the Lord showed unto Daniel, as we referred [illegible] fulfillment [illegible] of Jesus when the apostle [illegible] for to deliver [illegible] people [illegible] silent. But there must have been [illegible] of Daniel's people [illegible] earth [illegible] literature of [illegible] of which, the Church still [illegible] When then [illegible] [illegible] up unto [illegible] and many shall [illegible] And [illegible] from the dust of [illegible] shall [illegible] everlasting [illegible]

GREECE IN PROPHECY.

On Monday, January 25th, the cable brought the intelligence that Greece was threatening to declare war against Turkey, and had actually dispatched her fleet with sealed orders, its destination probably being some Turkish port. The significance of this intelligence to the student of prophecy consists in the fact that the enlargement of Greece at the expense of Turkey has long been seen to be an event necessary to the fulfillment of prophecy. The downfall of Turkey, as described in prophecy, is in the nature of a simple, not a progress. The phrase used in saying up" Rev. xvi. 12, implying that Turkey would exist by a gradual process.

For a long time it seemed as if the nations would fall before the gigantic power of the Czar, but students of prophecy never expected that such an event would take place for the word of prophecy distinctly refers to a great crisis by a coming army, still living at the time of the end. ## SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

The fond dreams of a reign of peace before the coming of our Lord are not only contrary to prophecy, but are contradicted by the tendency of all historical events. The closing days of the Dispensation are to be days of the greatest tribulation ever experienced in all human history. Instead of being days of universal peace, prosperity and righteousness, the moral and social conditions are to be a reversal of the universal violence before the flood and of the licentiousness of the cities of the plain. We place before our readers a condensed account of the riots in London about one week ago, Feb. 8.

Poetry.

Lines Composed upon the Death of Mrs. Nancy Bryant, wife of Daniel E. Bryant, of Hayward, Iowa, by Eld. H. R. Kendall.

O, how long shall death, the monster,
Reign in triumph o'er our race—
Laying low the pilgrim songster
In his cold and dread embrace!

O, how long and sad our dwelling
When the ones we loved are gone;—
Heaving sighs our bosoms swelling
Late at eve, and early morn.

Where, oh, where can the sad mourner
Turn his eye to find relief?
If we look to where they're borne her,
It will only add to grief.

Should we try to soothe our sorrow
In the world's gay, gilded throng;
Back the sadness comes tomorrow
When is hushed the merry song.

Hark! I hear a voice from heaven
Whisp'ring sweetest words of peace—
Unto you, bow heart, is given
From your sadness sure relief.

[illegible] night—but an hour,
When a conqueror in endless day;—
Where I shall triumph in his power
He will roll the stone away.

Then his voice shall call the sleeping
From their cave and silent tomb,
To a state where there's no weeping—
To a bright eternal home.

Then on the dear ones all will gather
In the mansions of the blest;
Never more to die or sever
In that home of perfect rest.

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST AS RELATED TO ISRAEL.

We find another passage bearing on this question in Zech. xii. xiii. xiv. In this prophecy we have first a prediction of the repentance and restoration of Israel. That it must refer to the future is plain, because the world has never seen any such universal repentance of Israel as is set forth in chap. xii. 10–14; neither has the Lord ever yet set his hand "to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem," as in chap. xii. 9; neither have we ever seen the blessed results which are said to follow the fulfilment of this prophesy when holiness unto the Lord shall be written even upon the bells of the horses, as is written in chap. xiv. 20.

Now, concerning the future repentance of the Jews, we read—"I will pour upon the house of David and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and of supplications: and they shall look upon Me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for him, as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for him, as one that is in bitterness for his first-born." Zech. xii. 10.

But if we turn to the New Testament, we find that the apostle John quotes a part of this passage in the Apocalypse, giving a literal translation from the Hebrew, and in so many words refers to the second advent of the Lord. For it is written Rev. i. 7—"Behold, he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him, and all kindreds of the earth;" (lit.) "all the tribes of the land shall wail because of him." And in this he was but following the example of the Lord Jesus, who had also used words from the same prophecy, referring their fulfilment in like manner to his future coming in the clouds of heaven, as in Matt. xxiv. 30, and the parallel passages.

If we examine the latter part of this same prophecy of Zechariah we shall find yet more explicit reference to the glorious personal advent of the Lord, in connection with that last terrible tribulation which will usher in the final repentance and restoration of Israel of which he writes. For in chap. xiv. we read that "in that day," namely, when all the tribes shall look on him whom they have pierced and mourn, and "a fountain shall be opened to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and for uncleanness," chap. xiii. 1, the day in which also the Lord "will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle," chap. xiv. 2, in that day the feet of the Lord "shall stand upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east," and "the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with Thee," chap. xiv. 4, 5.

As to the meaning of this phraseology, be it observed first, that it is utterly impossible to refer this standing of the Lord "upon the Mount of Olives" to anything in the first advent of our Lord. At no time, during the life of our Lord on earth, was there any such gathering of the nations against Jerusalem as is here described. Again, to say that it refers to a providential coming of the Lord when Jerusalem was destroyed, is wholly inconsistent with the context, and that for two reasons.

In the first place, of the siege against Jerusalem which is predicted here, it is said (v. 2, that "half of the city shall go forth into captivity, and the residue of the people shall not be cut off from the city." This is no description of the massacre and captivity which attended the destruction of Jerusalem under Titus. Neither was the issue of that tribulation such as that which is here foretold as the issue of this. For it is here said that that great conflict shall end in the final and everlasting repopulation of that land. "Men shall dwell in it and there shall be no more utter destruction, but Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited." Chap. xiv. 11. No providential coming of the Lord, that history has ever seen, can be intended here. The prophecy can be fitted to no past historical event, except by the most extreme violence to its plainest statements. Neither can the language be applied, according to the usage of Scripture symbolism, to a coming of the Lord by his Spirit. Where in the Scripture symbolism is there anything which would warrant one in saying, that the "standing of the feet of the Lord "upon the Mount of Olives" denoted a revival of religion?

The words must then refer to the future. They do not relate to the conversion of Israel; that has already been predicted. They naturally and most obviously describe the personal presence of the Lord of Israel at the time and precise spot mentioned in the parable—the very place, it may be observed, whence Christ ascended. They must refer to the future, second appearing of Jesus.

This is made the more certain when we observe the words in ver. 5:—"The Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with Thee!" If we should assume a spiritual or providential coming of the Lord to be here denoted, what can be meant by the coming of "all the saints" with the Lord? What event in the past or what predicted for the future, which could be rightly described as a coming of the Lord with all his saints, except it be that future coming of our Lord in the glory of his kingdom, when "all them that sleep in Jesus, God shall bring with him?" And if anything more be needed to settle the question, we have it in the fact that Paul in the New Testament quotes these very words which, according to Zechariah, describe what is to occur at the time of Israel's conversion and deliverance, as describing the future return of the Lord for resurrection. For he uses this language:—"To the end that he may establish your hearts unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints." 1 Thess. iii. 13.

We sum up, then, the teaching of this prophecy of Zechariah as follows:—Zechariah in these chapters xii.–xiv. predicts a yet future repentance of Israel and a future final deliverance of the Jews from all their enemies, in a day when a fountain shall be opened to them for sin and uncleanness. And he tells us further, that at that day they shall look upon him whom they pierced. Jesus and his apostle John both represent these words as fulfilled at the second coming of the Lord. Zechariah further tells us that in that day of Israel's salvation, the feet of the Lord "shall stand upon the Mount of Olives, and the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with him." But Paul represents these words also as finding their fulfilment at the second coming of the Lord. We must conclude, as from the other Scriptures cited, that Zechariah also represents the conversion and restoration of Israel as synchronising with the second appearing of the Lord to judge and reign.

It has been rejoined, that if this be correct interpretation of the Old Testament prophecies, it is very strange that we do not find the same truth in the New Testament. To this we answer, first, by asking whether those such objectors would wish us to understand that nothing can be held as certainly taught in the Old Testament, except it be also clearly affirmed in the New? No one, surely, will dare to assert that we are to believe nothing which is not taught in both Testaments; and yet, except on this assumption, what decisive force can there be in the objection? That there should not be, in any case, so much about the restoration of Israel in the New Testament as in the Old, is natural. For the New Testament was written, not specially, in the first instance, for the Jews, but for the churches of the Gentiles. But we deny that there is no reference in the New Testament to a restoration of the Jews in connection with the second advent of the Lord. This is plain, indeed, from the New Testament reference to the Old Testament prophecies already noticed. But there is more in the New Testament than these.

V. Let us look, in the first instance, at the words of our Lord in Luke xxi. 24 et seq. In that passage and context the Lord predicts the destruction of Jerusalem and the accompanying calamities. He said that Jerusalem should be trodden down by the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles should be fulfilled. Surely no man can say that this is the spiritual Jerusalem, the New Testament church—the ready resource of interpreters in so many other places. For the prophecy has in large part passed into fulfilment, and has been fulfilled in the literal Jerusalem, in the land of Palestine. That city is trodden down of the Gentiles now and has been ever since 70 A. D. But the words naturally imply that a time is coming when the state of things shall cease. Jesus did not say Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles for ever. He distinctly fixes a limit to this condition of things. It shall be trodden down "till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." Surely these words imply that a day is coming when Gentile rule in Jerusalem shall come to an end, and Israel shall be re-instated there. Till that day, the long tribulation lasts on Israel, even as yet today. Then it will end. It is till that day, Israel's restoration is clearly assumed.

But is there anything here about the second advent? Let us look at Matthew's account of the same discourse. He tells us that our Lord said explicitly, that when that "tribulation," comprehending with all else this age-long treading down of Jerusalem by the Gentiles, shall cease, then, "immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of heaven shall be shaken; and then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven; and the"—observe that he quotes the words used by Zechariah of the repentance of Israel—"then shall all the tribes of the earth (or of the land) mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Matt. xxiv. How could language be plainer? "Immediately after" the tribulation of Israel ends; when Jerusalem shall cease to be trodden of the Gentiles, and Israel shall in some degree be established in their own land; immediately thereafter shall appear the awful signs which shall be swiftly followed by the appearing of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven! Is not this a re-affirmation of that which we have already seen to be the teaching of the Old Testament Scriptures? and that by the authority of our Lord himself? Surely he places together the restoration of Israel and his second coming.

VI. Nor is this the only passage where we may perceive a reference to the same truth. For it is written, that just before his death, when taking solemn leave of the apostate nation, he closed an awful series of woes in these words:—"Ye shall not see me hereafter till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Surely, in the light of all the Scriptures to which we have attended, the natural inference from these words is this—that while he would be withdrawn from their bodily vision during the whole period, however long, in which they should continue as a nation to reject him, yet, when they should cease to reject him—when they should say, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord"—instead of being ready to crucify him—then they should see Him again.

VII. That the personal return of the Lord is conditioned by Israel's repentance, is also directly taught by the apostle Peter in Acts iii. 19–21, where, according to the accurate rendering of the revised version, we read that Peter said unto the Jews to whom he was preaching:—"Repent ye and turn again, that your sins may be blotted out, that so there may come seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord; and that he may send the Christ who hath been appointed for you, even Jesus; whom the heavens must receive until the times of restoration of all things, whereof God spoke by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began." Here in plain language Peter teaches the Jews, as a motive to lead them to repentance, that if they will repent, God will send the Christ, even Jesus, whom the heavens must receive until the times of predicted restoration. What could be plainer? Even Prof. Addison Alexander has been compelled to admit in his commentary on this passage, that if we are to allow the usage of language to determine the meaning of words, then we must admit that Peter here is speaking of a personal advent of the Lord, and not of any providential or spiritual coming whatever. In the light of such passages can we reasonably doubt what Paul had in mind, when in Rom. xi. 26, 27, writing of the restoration of the Jews, or—more precisely—their conversion, he quotes with a slight variation in confirmation of his teaching, the word of the prophet Isaiah to which we have already attended, to the effect that it is when "the Redeemer shall come out of Zion" that ungodliness shall be turned away from Jacob.

We conclude, then, that there is abundant evidence that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament agree in representing the future restoration and conversion of Israel as accomplished by, or taking place in closest connection with, the glorious return of the Lord Jesus to judge and reign. When Israel returns, then, we are assured death shall be swallowed up in victory; Christ's dead men shall live; together with his dead body shall they rise. When Israel repents, the Redeemer shall come to Zion and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob. In the day of Israel's final cleansing the Lord our God shall come, and all the saints with him, and his feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, and Israel "shall look upon him whom they have pierced and shall mourn for him . . . . as one that is in bitterness for his first-born." To the same effect the Lord Jesus teaches, that when Israel's long tribulation shall end, Jerusalem shall cease to be trodden down by the Gentiles, and immediately thereafter shall be introduced the signs which herald the coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven to judgment, and to reward his people. How natural is it that Peter, with full recognition of the mighty blessings—both to Israel as a nation, and to the church—which, according to these Scriptures, stand connected with the restoration and repentance of Israel, should urge his nation to repent and turn, that so might come the promised times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, and that God might send the Christ which had been appointed for them, even Jesus! And according to this inspired teaching, with how much reason could Paul say concerning Israel, Rom. xi. 15; "If the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead?" To all which our hearts respond, Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus!—S. H. Kellogg, at Niagara Conference.

THE EUPHRATES.

The Jewish World contains the following:—"Much of the difficulty in defending disputed passages of Scripture has arisen from geographical changes—natural, not political—which have taken place in the course of long periods of time. There can be no doubt, for example, that the question of the route of the Exodus has been greatly complicated in this way. We are now threatened with a greater geographical change which will remove one of the most prominent of Biblical monuments. If we may credit an Indian contemporary, we are on the eve of witnessing the total disappearance of the Euphrates—"the famous river that watered the cradle of the human race, and whose banks saw the dawn of civilization and history." It appears that for many years, in the lower course of the river below Babylon, the banks have been gradually giving way and the water spreading itself into a vast marsh. Hitherto some sort of channel has always been found for the Arab boats plying on the river, but now even this miserable opening is becoming obliterated in the unusual overflow. The consequence will be that, ere long, the desert will have swallowed up the far-famed river. The correspondent to whom we are indebted for the newspaper containing this intelligence directs our attention to the prophesy in Revelation xvi. 12:—"And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the Kings of the East might be prepared."

It may be possible that the wonderful change here referred to is in some way preparatory to the fulfilment of Rev. xvi. 12, but it can hardly be taken as the fulfilment itself. If we take into consideration the nature of the change that is taking place. It is not the drying up of the Euphrates, but its conversion into a vast inland lake or marshy sea; the water is still there, but the boundaries which formerly kept it in a certain course, no longer restrain it, so that it is overflowing the land. It is a change which has been going on for a long time, and is referred to by Dr. Keith in his chapter on the "Desolation of Babylon" (Evidence of Prophesy), as a fulfilment of Jer. li. 42:—"The sea is come up upon Babylon; she is covered with the multitude of the waves thereof."

THE COMING AGE,

—IN—

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WESTFALL.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of Knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 340 large pages, bound in Cloth Price $2.00. Send to this office for this work.

Fellowship.

[illegible] Del., Oct. 30, 1885.

Dear Bro. Williams:

[illegible]

with Christadelphians on the question of fellowship." I consider this a mistake. I think it is well known that I have been in fellowship with Christadelphians many, many years, and am yet except it may be in the imagination of a few who take extreme and incorrect views of late as to the question of fellowship.

You further say, "The Doctor has said that immortal emergence is a doctrine and not one of the first principles."

This is another mistake. I hold that, although it does affect first principles, yet, that is not of itself one of those principles—that neither the doctrine of mere "immortal emergence" nor "eternal emergence," as held or even called in the Scriptures one of the first principles. But the great and important doctrine of the "resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment," is distinctly named as among the first principles, and of course, therefore, an indispensable part of the one faith—the things most surely believed—which forms the true basis of fellowship. But the modus operandi, the details, the time, the how and where etc., are not necessarily included in the one faith, except so far as plainly revealed and understood, and, therefore, exact agreement in these should not be required as the basis or test for the acknowledgment of fellowship, nor any other things not plainly revealed, any more than the understanding and exact agreement as to the meaning of the entire Bible.

Fellowship, in the Scriptures, comes from the Greek word koinonia, and simply means companionship, communion: and communion means agreement, not agreement as to the entire teaching of the Bible, nor as to conclusions or opinions arrived at by a process of reasoning, about which we may honestly differ, or be incapable of seeing alike; but as to the things which constitute the "one faith" the gospel, "or things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ." Intelligent, understanding faith in these, when professed by the believer—baptism into the one name and one body of Christ—constitute the "one faith." This every person of like precious faith is in agreement, communion, fellowship with, [illegible] such person with every [illegible] the communion, fellowship of the [illegible] Tim. vi. 3–5. [illegible] brother that [illegible] contrary to the in[illegible] light, is to be in fellowship with his Son, who is the light of the world, and to be in fellowship with the Son, is to believe in the light, and follow the light—for that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." "If we believe in our Saviour Christ as we profess, and obey his truth—the word of truth—the word of truth, the gospel, the children of the light."

The true basis of fellowship is an exact knowledge of, and a living faith in, the truth, and an understanding of, and intelligent faith in, all truth, as set forth in the things written in the law and in the prophets, or necessarily all agreement writings in the New Testament, before there can be fellowship, but faith in the word of truth, the gospel. Eph. i. 3, 4 Pet. i. 22, 25. But, of course, one who is in the gospel does not exist who is previously believing all the Scriptures are required to teach, the whole truth, is free, [illegible] book or the [illegible]

The test of fellowship centers in the unity of the Spirit—the bond of peace—the one gospel—one faith, one baptism, one name—one body—one spirit, one hope, one Lord, one God, our Father of all—and all walking in the unity of the faith."

All persons [illegible] in fellowship one to the other, and all [illegible] Scriptures, so far as they understand, are walking in the light, and in fellowship with the Father and with his Son, Jesus Christ, and with every true member of the one body. It follows that we are one with every member of his body. Fellowship with him now is, and is fellowship with all his brethren, so long as they are in the body, or walking in the light.

We are not at liberty to receive and fellowship any one who denies, or refuses to believe and obey the gospel, and thus to become a member of the one body.

Every member of the one body is such by virtue of the one faith; and all are of the same mind—all speak the same thing, as to the things of the kingdom and name. All are thus in agreement or fellowship, whether they know it or realize it, or not; and [illegible] acknowledge it by joining [illegible] of the loaf or not. [illegible] breaking [illegible]

[illegible] which is simply the acknowledgment or manifestation of the fellowship, the communion, which previously exists by like precious faith in the same one gospel, the faith which worketh by love. The partaking together of the symbols, the bread and wine, is the outward manifestation of the communion, the fellowship, the oneness of the one faith in the one gospel, throughout the entire body, previously and necessarily existing between the many members before it is possible to be a member of the body of Christ, represented by the one loaf, or one bread. As soon as a person is begotten by the reception of the word of truth, the gospel, the incorruptible seed, the word of the kingdom, into good ground, an honest and good heart, and such begetting manifested by baptism, the quickening, such person has received the application of the blood of Christ, the remission of past sins, the one name called or placed upon him, his natural disposition changed to the Abrahamic or Christ-like obedient disposition, and he has become one of the many members of the one body, the household of faith. All such persons, and no others, are of necessity, actually and positively in fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ, and therefore with all the true members of his body. All such persons, and none others, are true brethren of Christ, and being therein in fellowship, are entitled to receive the right hand of fellowship, (Gal. ii. 9), are entitled to the acknowledgment and outward visible manifestation of the fellowship, in the way appointed by the Master.

Having partaken of Christ on passover, by partaking of his truth, his words of eternal life, his mind and disposition, and thus been brought into fellowship—and except we do which there is no life in us, John vi. 53–58—it is then a duty as well as a privilege, and not till then, to partake of the symbols of his body and blood to show forth his death till he come.

We are not to have fellowship with devils nor with unrighteousness, nor with unfruitful works of darkness; and we are required to withdraw from men who consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness; men of corrupt minds, destitute of the truth, the [illegible] 1 Tim. vi. 3–5. structions and requirements of the gospel, and to have no company with them. 2 Thes. iii. 6, 15; 1 Cor. v. [illegible].

But if we [illegible] we are commanded or required to withdraw ourselves or our fellowship from any member of the body, [illegible] any brother, for [illegible] or walking disorderly and living in disobedience to the one faith, is [illegible] and disobedience to the one gospel? Where are we commanded to withdraw ourselves or our fellowship from any brother who is living in [illegible] the one faith, like Abraham, [illegible] that the statement [illegible] not to be performed [illegible] God, but is fully persuaded that what God hath promised he is able to perform? Rom. iv. 20 and was fully worked by love, causing him to desire to observe all things whatsoever Christ had commanded, [illegible] according strictly to the apostolic doctrine and practice and breaking of bread and in prayers?

[illegible] possible, however, to be under a mistake similar to the one [illegible] and we are told to have no company with [illegible] that is, to withdraw ourselves from [illegible] and to withdraw from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which he received of us. 2 Thess. iii. 6. Even Peter made and like him, do [illegible] with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ, and with every true member of the one body. It follows that we are one with every member of his body. Fellowship with him now is, and is fellowship with all his brethren, so long as they are in the body, or walking in the light.

We are not at liberty to receive and fellowship any one who denies, or refuses to believe and obey the gospel, and thus to become a member of the one body.

Every member of the one body is such by virtue of the one faith; and all are of the same mind—all speak the same thing, as to the things of the kingdom and name. All are thus in agreement or fellowship, whether they know it or realize it, or not; and [illegible] acknowledge it by joining [illegible] of the loaf or not. [illegible] breaking [illegible]

[illegible] which is simply the acknowledgment or manifestation of the fellowship, the communion, which previously exists by like precious faith in the same one gospel, the faith which worketh by love. The partaking together of the symbols, the bread and wine, is the outward manifestation of the communion, the fellowship, the oneness of the one faith in the one gospel, throughout the entire body, previously and necessarily existing between the many members before it is possible to be a member of the body of Christ, represented by the one loaf, or one bread. As soon as a person is begotten by the reception of the word of truth, the gospel, the incorruptible seed, the word of the kingdom, into good ground, an honest and good heart, and such begetting manifested by baptism, the quickening, such person has received the application of the blood of Christ, the remission of past sins, the one name called or placed upon him, his natural disposition changed to the Abrahamic or Christ-like obedient disposition, and he has become one of the many members of the one body, the household of faith. All such persons, and no others, are of necessity, actually and positively in fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ, and therefore with all the true members of his body. All such persons, and none others, are true brethren of Christ, and being therein in fellowship, are entitled to receive the right hand of fellowship, (Gal. ii. 9), are entitled to the acknowledgment and outward visible manifestation of the fellowship, in the way appointed by the Master.

Having partaken of Christ on passover, by partaking of his truth, his words of eternal life, his mind and disposition, and thus been brought into fellowship—and except we do which there is no life in us, John vi. 53–58—it is then a duty as well as a privilege, and not till then, to partake of the symbols of his body and blood to show forth his death till he come.

We are not to have fellowship with devils nor with unrighteousness, nor with unfruitful works of darkness; and we are required to withdraw from men who consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness; men of corrupt minds, destitute of the truth, the [illegible] 1 Tim. vi. 3–5. [illegible] to withdraw [illegible] brother that [illegible] Acts [illegible] Human statement [illegible]

as follows: "To refuse to assent to this, is to deny one of the first principles of the doctrine of Christ!" It has been wisely and truly said that it is demonstrable that the whole of the apostasy is due to human endeavor to improve upon the form of sound words written by the Spirit.

Other examples of departure from the word of truth, or attempts to improve on the word, might be given, but it is only necessary to give one more quotation, which applies to the entire statement, (33 articles) viz. all [illegible] should give their unqualified assent and conformance to the Statement of Faith and Basis of Fellowship, before they shall be eligible to membership in this Ecclesia. And all persons and visitors from abroad, believers of good report, who submit to the same choice, evidenced by their signature, be cordially invited to participate in the worship, provided also, that such visitors shall agree to refrain or refrain to fellowship all who do not do so.

Is any portion of our Statement of Faith and Basis of Fellowship [illegible]?

All who understood what fellowship is, that it is simply agreement—a having agreement as to the one faith, faith of the [illegible] faith in certain things plainly revealed on points of (not) [illegible] things clearly revealed [illegible] and [illegible] fashion [illegible] fear of the Jews [illegible] such persons would readily see, that all who believe these things are of one [illegible] fellowship. A brother or [illegible] other accounts or wrongfully refuse to acknowledge fellowship in the appointed way or act, by withdrawing himself, but he cannot withdraw his fellowship from those who believe and obey the gospel, without he himself depart from the faith.

Fellowship has its origin in agreement and love of the truth, love of the Father, love of the Son, love of the brethren. "And this commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God, love his brother also." "If a man say, I love God and hateth his brother, he is a liar." Every one that loveth him, that begat, loveth him also that is begotten. (Every brother has been begotten). By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another. It is therefore our duty to love and fellowship all faithful brethren. All that will be saved are brethren. He that believeth the gospel and is baptized shall be saved. The gospel is the power of God unto salvation. Peter preached the gospel the word. This is the word [illegible] Peter which by the gospel is preached unto you. 1 Pet. i. 25. Then they that gladly received his word were baptized: and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls (persons). And the Lord added to the church daily such as shall be saved. Not much [illegible] or chance. I fancy, to instruct them as to all the details concerning the resurrection, judgment, and other first principles of the gospel. So in the case of Philip preaching in Samaria. Acts viii. 5, 12, and when he preached to the eunuch while the thing with him and in case of Paul and Silas to the jailor and all his house, and many other examples.

Nothing said about getting up statements of faith, and basis of fellowship. Yet I have no doubt in every case, they preached the doctrine which is according to godliness, sound doctrine, which Paul says is according to the glorious gospel. 1 Tim. i. 2.

All Scripture is profitable, but it was not necessary in the days of Peter and Philip and Paul, neither is it now necessary to understand and believe all the Scripture in order to be saved, and in order to be in the Apostle's doctrine and fellowship. Simply believing and obeying the gospel, brought them into fellowship.

The keys of the kingdom were given by the Master to Peter, who said to him and the other disciples. Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. When, therefore, Peter, standing up with the eleven, preached the gospel, that Christ was raised up to sit on David's throne, when he is to reign over the house of Jacob forever; and when those that heard him were pricked in their heart and asked the question, What shall we do? He answered, Repent and be baptized for the remission of sins, he thus used the key, and unlocked and opened the door, made known the way into the household of God—rulers in the kingdom of heaven. He thus admitted the three thousand, to be loosed from their sins, by faith in the gospel, and baptism into the name: those not believing, left he bound, in bondage to sin, and so he determined for all time, what is necessary to be believed before [illegible] Christ, not what was believed [illegible] Christ, but they admitted by their question that they believed what Peter preached. If Peter said more than is recorded, no doubt the Spirit has caused all that was necessary to be put in the record, as our guide, that we might be thoroughly furnished on this point.

Only a few days before Christ was crucified, neither Peter nor any of the Apostles themselves understood anything about either the resurrection or resurrection and judgment, although Christ himself had been their teacher for years. Luke xviii. 31; and after his resurrection he opened their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures. He told them, on the very day of his renewal, that after his death, resurrection and ascension, the Father would send the Holy Spirit, who should guide them, and teach them, and show them things to come. John xiv. 26, xvi. 13, and on the very day he rose, while eating with them, he told them to tarry in Jerusalem until the Father's promise to send the Spirit, should be fulfilled, which was set according to promise on the day of Pentecost. Acts ii 22. the very day that three thousand were added through Peter's preaching.

Not only did Jesus tell the twelve that the Spirit should come and teach them and show them things to come, but the [illegible] year, when Paul was called to the work of the [illegible] will, and he [illegible] out all men, Jesus said to him, For I have appeared unto thee for this purpose to make thee a minister and a witness both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee. That is those things of the future, which he would subsequently reveal to him. Acts xxvi. 16. Accordingly nearly a quarter of a century afterwards, Paul, in his first letter to the Church at Corinth, says, Behold I show you a mystery, we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, etc. He thus made known to them, after so long a time, a mystery or secret, very important things or details concerning the resurrection and judgment, and the absolute incorruptibility. 1 Cor. xv. 51, 53. These things had evidently been but recently revealed to him, for about five years before that, he went from Athens to Corinth and continued there a year and six months teaching the word of God, the gospel of the kingdom. Acts xviii. 11; xx. 24, 25, and yet God was during all that time, not until years afterward, when he wrote from this first epistle, made known to them those important things, which he evidently would have done, had they been revealed to him at the time he was with them a year and a half teaching, and declaring unto them all the counsel of God, which had then been revealed Acts xx. 27. In the [illegible] of the first letter to them, referring to the time when he was with them preaching, he says he then spoke to them as babes in Christ and fed them with milk and not with meat (or solid food) because they were not able to bear it, but also tells them that God had revealed the deep things—a mystery which, farther on he shows them. 1 Cor. ii. 1, 10; iii. 1, 2; xv. 51. Then in his epistle to the Hebrews, chap. v. 12, 14; vi. 12, he tells what he means by milk—simply the first principles, the gospel, which includes the recognition of the simple facts or truths of resurrection and judgment, etc., but not the details, or theorizing about the facts. He there tells us also that the deep things which God had revealed, the strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age, etc. Peter also says that new born babes, who are therefore brethren, though not able to bear strong meat, require and grow by pure milk of the word, 1 Pet. ii. 2, and in his second Epistle he tells us just what he means by the word: This is the word which by the gospel is preached unto you, the incorruptible seed, by which all babes in Christ have been begotten, and quickened, and born of water. 1 Pet. i. 23, 25; Acts viii. 4, 12.

All this goes to corroborate the fact that what was preached by Peter on the day of Pentecost, and by Paul at Corinth, and by Philip at Samaria, was simply the gospel, and by which all who believed and were baptized, became babes in Christ, children of God, brethren, and then entitled to fellowship by all the members of the one body; then to be fed with the pure milk of the word that they might grow thereby, until they are of full age, those who, by reason of use, have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil; then, strong meat, deep things and details, all things commanded and required, belong to them. Heb. v. 14—who should thus continually grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

Such was the order of God then, and such is the order of God now.

Again you say, With the understanding that Bro. Thomas accepts our position and fails in line with us, [illegible] etc.

Now dear brother, as to the truth and its fellowship, I think I am and have been for many years in line with the Father and the Son, and all true brethren, whether they are willing to acknowledge it or not by so saying, including our deceased brother, the late Dr. Thomas. I understand my position to be the very highest plane of fellowship, and I would not like to accept any position, which would require me to fall, in order to set in line. Besides, in my visits among the brethren in many of the cities and other places, during the past three or four years, I have had the most without the authority or sufficient support from the Scriptures; and if so accepted, then a withdrawal or refusal to fellowship—cutting off and [illegible] out all this has flatly contradicted the principles disputed, which [illegible] both or else the [illegible] have the [illegible] and [illegible] that [illegible] and [illegible] out of the [illegible] 2 John iv. 10.

[illegible] them that cause divisions [illegible] A tree is known by its fruits," [illegible] their fruits to shall know them [illegible] of the spirit and work of the flesh. Gal. v. 19–24.

Only think, a wrong division, and trouble and [illegible] and disgrace, and abuse all, and all to the truth, souls have been saved, if this plain Scriptural view of the fellowship—"holding the gospel" (Phil. i. 5) had been understood and followed. Where is the Scriptural authority for the conclusion, that a creed in uninspired human words must be the basis of fellowship, and must be signed, and those brethren refusing to consent and sign, must be cut off, cast out, repudiated! Where? Oh, where!

But, dear Bro. I do not allow all this, even, to offend me, or turn me off the straight and narrow way—the true line. I desire to have and fellowship all worthy faithful brethren, for the Master said to his disciples the last hour before he was crucified, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another." John says, "we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren." Even all that, if necessary. And Paul says, "we were willing to have imparted unto you, not the gospel of God only, but also our own lives, because ye were dear unto us." But how dear is one's worthy brother, and how much does he love him, when he refuses to manifest his fellowship by eating the Lord's Supper together?

I beseech you my brethren, look ye well to this matter. "Be not many masters, knowing that we shall receive greater condemnation." "For one is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren." The Master will soon come. "When once the Master of the house is risen up, and hath shut the door."—What then? Luke xiii. 24–26.

THE RETURN OF THE JEWS. NO. II.

The return of a remnant of Israel is also proved by Isa. x. 21, 22. "A remnant shall return, even the remnant of Jacob, unto the mighty God. For though thy people Israel be as the sand of the sea, only a remnant of them shall return." The two words put here in italics are so put to indicate that they are not in the original. Now the prophets often refer to an elect remnant. This term includes not only those who will be recovered from surrounding nations, but also those in the land who will have escaped death during the terrible battle with the Anti-christ and his armies. Paul refers to "a remnant according to the election of grace." Rom. xi. 5. But this refers to those who, during the period of Israel's dispersion and subjection as a nation will, by the grace of God, have received the religion of Christ, and become true believers.

The following passages are also very conclusive:—"In days to come shall Jacob take root; Israel shall blossom and bud: and they shall fill the face of the world with fruit." "And it shall come to pass in that day, that a great trumpet shall be blown; and they shall come which were ready to perish in the land of Assyria, and they that were outcast in the land of Egypt; and they shall worship the Lord in the holy mountain at Jerusalem." Isa. xxxvii. 6, 13. Words such as these, so full of meaning, and yet so plain, as to require no comment.

This wonderful period seems to be the same as is referred to in chapter xviii. 3: "All ye inhabitants of the world, and ye dwellers on the earth, when an ensign is lifted up on the mountains, see ye; and when the trumpet is blown, hear ye." Is not this the gathering referred to in Matt. xxiv. 31? "And he shall send forth his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." Most theologians take this to refer to the general resurrection and the scene of the last judgment; but this, we think, is a great mistake. It evidently refers to the beginning of the thousand years' reign—which will indeed be one of ... events immediately ...ilford says, "This ...pt of the general ...ix. xv. 52, except ...ay be spoken of as ...first resurrection." ...events of this pe... ...salm is clearly pro... ...ot shall come, and ...ire: a fire shall de... ...ad it shall be very ...d about him. He shall call to the heavens above, and to the earth, that he may judge his people. Gather my saints together unto me, those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice. And the heavens shall declare his righteousness; for God is Judge himself. Hear, O my people, and I will speak; O Israel, and I will testify unto thee: I am God, even thy God. I will not reprove thee for thy sacrifices: and thy burnt offerings are continually before me." Verses 1-8.

Then pages might be filled with the bare enumeration of the blessings which are to accompany their gathering; but those blessings did not accompany the gathering when they came from Babylon; therefore, the gathering must be yet future, for it is undeniable that the blessings are future. As a people, they are to be satisfied with the goodness of the Lord; they are to be called the sons of the living God; the Lord is to be their God, and they are to be his people; the Lord will keep them as a shepherd doth his flock, and shall redeem them from their enemies; He will give them one heart and one way; He will put his law in their inward parts, and in their hearts will he write it; He will cleanse them from their iniquities, and they shall all become righteous; every one shall know the Lord from the least even unto the greatest. All these things are distinctly stated in the prophetical writings; all these blessings, with others we have not mentioned, are distinctly promised. To men who have not taken leave of their reason, or shut their eyes to facts, it is not necessary to offer any proof to show that the Jewish people, as a people, have never yet been in possession of these blessings. Therefore, if these prophecies are ever fulfilled, it must be in the future.

Thus numerous passages declare, in a very emphatic manner, the restoration of this long scattered people. To some this may seem impossible; to others it may seem impossible; but God does not lack means to accomplish his purposes. Oftentimes the will of man, opposed to the will of God, brings about certain events, and God overrules those events for the execution of his own divine plans. We know not in what particular manner the event will come to pass; but Jehovah will probably use England to secure the return of the Jews to Palestine, and England, together with two or three other countries, may protect them, for a while, from other nations. Many will return and gather together in the land of their fathers before they have accepted Christ as the Anointed One.

The Book of Job, called Job, Son of Zare, Son of Hragnel, Son of Heanu, Son of Isaac, Son of Habraam, according to the Septuagint.

CHAP. 3.

1. After that Job opened his mouth and cursed his day,
2. Saying,
3. Would that the day had been lost on which I was begotten, and that night when they said, lo a male child.
4. Would that that night had been pitch darkness and that the Lord from above had never summoned it up; and that a ray had never come unto it.
5. That pitch darkness and the shadow of death had taken it away, and that thick gloom had come upon it; that the day had been accursed,
6. And that night, that pitch darkness had borne it away; that it had not been in the days of a year, and numbered in days of months;
7. Yea, would that that night had been woe and that rejoicing and harmony had not come unto it.
8. Yea, would that He who is destined to lay his hand upon the great sea-monster, had cursed that day;
9. Would that the stars of that night had been darkened, that they had waited and not come to illuminate and had not seen Hesaphoros (the morning-bringer) arise;
10. Why did he not close the gates of my mother's womb? For he would have shut out pain from my eyes.
11. Yea, why did I not come to an end in the womb; and why did I come forth from the belly and not straightway perish?
12. And why did knees gather me and why did I nurse the breast?
13. Even now would that I might lie down and be at ease, sleep and be at rest:
14. Along with kings, the counsellors of the earth, who store upon their great wealth;
15. Or with rulers whose gold was much, who filled their houses with silver.
16. Or that I had been like an abortion that goeth its way from a mother's womb.
17. There irreverent ones have burned out anger's wrath.

There the lady's weary toil hath ceased.

18. And there, with one accord, the age-lasting ones have refused to listen to the tax-gatherer's voice.
19. Small and great are there, and the courtier who feared his lord.
20. Why, forsooth hath light been given to those in bitterness, and life to souls (as vitals) in woe?
21. Those who long for death and do not attain it, though they dig for it, as for hid treasures?
22. And would be overjoyed if they got it.
23. Death for a noble man is a rest, for God hath closed it close upon him.
24. Before food doth my sighing come alas; and I weep constrained with fear.
25. Yea a fear what I thought of hath come upon me, and that which I dreaded hath come to meet me.
26. Neither am I at peace, nor quiet, nor at rest, But wrath hath come upon me.

CHAP. 4.

1. And Eliphaz the Thaalmanite, taking up the discourse, saith:
2. Has there not been talk by thee many a time on the subject of weary toil? but who could endure the vim of thy spoken words?
3. Yea, if thou hast instructed many and helped weak hands,
4. And aroused with words those who were weak, and clothed feeble knees with courage,
5. And now that pain hath come upon thee and touched thee, hast thou made haste?
6. Is not rather thy fear in folly and thy hope even the calamity of thy way?
7. Call to mind thou who that is clean that hath been lost; or when any who were wholly rooted in truth were lost
8. According as I have seen people plough places that were no places and sow them, do they reap woe for themselves.
9. By a statute of the Lord do they suffer loss, and before a breath of his wrath will they have vanished away.
10. The lion's growl and the cry of the lioness, and the snoring hiss of dragons have been checked;
11. The ant-lion hath perished for want of pasture; and lions' whelps have forsaken one another:
12. But if anything in words spoken by thee had proved true, none of these calamities would have met thee. Shall my ear accept or not strange out-of-the-way things from him?
13. A fear, for instance, that falleth upon men with dread and at the echo of the night.
14. Shuddering was face to face with me and trembling, and my bones shook exceedingly;
15. And a breath came upon my face, and my hair and flesh shuddered.
16. I stood up and did not recognise; I looked up and there was no shape before my eyes; only a breath of air and a sound heard I.
17. Why forsooth? Shall a mortal be clean in the sight of the Lord, or shall a man be blameless by reason of his own doings?
18. If he doth not trust his own servants, and hath observed something crooked as regards his angels,
19. Those who inhabit clay houses of whom are we, even of that same clay, them hath he smitten like the moth;
20. And from morning until evening are they no more; they have perished because they could not help themselves.
21. Yea he breathed on them and they withered away; they perished because they had no wisdom.

All nature's changes I can trace,
Have fallen by the stroke of death:
Companions of my youthful hours,
Who sported with me 'neath the flowers,
They, too, are gone; I never knew one
With whom life's journey I began.
Still all around is teeming life;
With many joys and sorrows rife;
And change and death, are busy ever;
And heart from heart doth daily sever:
But thy great works and precious word,
Are still the same, my loving Lord!
The sun as bright, the air as clear,
The stars as beautiful and dear,
As when my childlike eyes surveyed
The wondrous world thy hands have made.
As when I sat at the harper's feet,
I hearkened to my youthful heart,
And felt its every throb depart.
Now that my life's work I record,
I leave it all my Father's hand.
And though I mourn most precious ones,
Yet thy sure truth stays for us,

A Glass of Wine.

A large party of excursionists, guests of the company, were in an Arkansas railway-train, en route to visit the advertising lands of a famous pine district. Baskets of champagne had been provided, and the excursionists in that unconstraining conviviality which steals along so gently with the alleged juice of the grape, soon became unable to distinguish one kind of land from another or to recognize the difference between a pine log and a [illegible]

At a way station a young man boarded the train, and took the only vacant seat in the car beside a rather old gentleman who did not seem to join in the festivities of the intoxicated occasion.

"Gentlemen, [illegible]," said a red-faced fellow, handing him a glass. "Fill her up to the brim," pouring out the seething enemy to a clear head. "Everything goes," and he passed on in answer to the summons of an uplifted glass at the other end of the car. Just as the young man was about to drink, the old gentleman said:

"Will you wait until I tell you a story before you drink that?"

The young man looked up in surprise at the old gentleman.

"I won't detain you long. This reminds me so much of something that occurred years ago in my life that I cannot refrain from speaking about it."

His earnest manner impressed the young man. And as he held up the glass and looked for a moment at the shining beads arising from its stem-like bottom, he replied.

"Yes, I will wait."

"Thank you," and in a manner still more impressive, the old man began: "I had been away from home a number of years and was returning on a steamboat, when I fell in with a party very much like this one. Champagne was as free as water, and with the delightful idea of hospitality which wine inspires I was enjoined to drink. I shuddered at the thought. My father had died a drunkard and my eldest brother was in a drunkard's grave. I had ever been sober, and my mother, the gentlest of women, looked to me as the solace of her feeble years, the one embodiment of purposes rescued from the wreck of our household ship.

"I say that I shuddered in the more contemplation of taking the wine which they insisted that I should drink, and to escape the noisy crowd I went to my state room; but this was no safeguard against the hilarious persuasions, for they went upon the door and declared that if I did not come out they would beat it down. Thus I was compelled to join them, but still I refused to drink. Finally, a very respectable-looking and quite old gentleman said to me, 'Take a glass or so; it won't hurt you; a little champagne is no more hurtful than a little water. Here—' and he filled a glass and handed it to me. I drank, and soon felt that the old man had well advised me, for I felt no inconvenience. I took another and another, and the crowd seemed to be less noisy. I went with the men who had knocked on my door, and prevailed on another young man to drink. I laughed immoderately, and thought that I had never before seen so gay a company. Once my mother's often-repeated words, "My son, I would rather see you in your coffin than to see you drunk," sounded like a distant knell, ringing from away back in childhood, but they became fainter and fainter until at last I heard no warning. The old man who had advised me to drink, came to me and said, "Look here, you have had enough wine!" I had become rich. I knew well enough that I had but little money, but somehow I was rich. The boat seemed to be flying down the rivers, and I laughed at the trees as they seemed to whirl along the bank. I had a great scheme on hand, and after that I was going to drink nothing but wine. I thanked the old man time and again for inducing me to drink so delightful a beverage, and thought what fools men were to toil in discontent when they could drink wine and be happy. After awhile the pleasurable feelings left me, and were supplanted by sickening sensations.

"My head swam so that I could scarcely see anything. While I was in this condition the boat reached my landing. I saw a hack, heard half-familiar voices, and then saw a face ghastly pale. I was whirled away in the hack, and saw the ghastly face again, and heard groans of despair. In the night some one tried to arouse me, but in vain. At morning I awoke with a feverish thirst, and with that horror and shame—that feeling which convinces a man of his unworthiness to live, I crept out of bed and went down stairs. I could not go into mother's room. I could not bear to see the face I had made ghastly. I went to the well to cool my burning brow. There I met one of the servants, an old negro who had romped with me on his shoulders when I was a boy. The old man did not look at me when I approached, and turning to him, I said, 'Uncle Alf, don't treat me this way. I know I ought to die, but I hope to make you all forget this.' Tears were streaming down his face Turning and pointing to the house, he said, in a voice of trembling emotion: 'Mars' John, Mars' John, may the Lord forgib yer.'" I waited for no more. A terrible dread had seized me. I ran to the house and hurried into mother's room. Oh! horror! she lay there dead! I kissed her ghastly face and cried aloud in my anguish. The room swam before me and I fell insensible to the floor. When I regained consciousness, old Alf was sitting by the bedside. The ghastly face had gone into the ground, but I saw it still. I cursed the fate that had not sent me home in a coffin: and even now, after long years, I wish that I had been taken home dead. Now, young man, you may drink your wine."

"No! no!" he exclaimed, throwing the wine from the window. "I am going home to see my mother and press the warm red lips of love. Thank God, that you have saved her feet from ghastliness."—Arkansas Traveller.

Dear Children:

While writing you, my memory often gathers some scattered fragment of my early youth, which the dust of time had almost obliterated. When quite a little girl I firmly believed that our heavenly Father was a rewarder of those who diligently sought him, and in the sweetest confidence and childish trust I would pour out to him, every loving desire of my young heart.

In my Sunday School class was a sweet child, whose disposition and mind, seemed to be inclined to every thing heavenly. She thirsted for knowledge, and would listen with the deepest interest to hear about our Lord. She begged me to teach her how to talk to God. I taught her this little prayer: "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me." She earnestly craved this gift. One day she came to school, with her face beaming with delight, and gently whispering in my ear, she said, O Teacher I am sure God has heard my prayer. I replied, how can you tell, Mary? She said, because Teacher, I have such a desire to do right, and there is no little girl that can be happier than I am. If I could only hear more about Jesus, then I would try and be like him. She earnestly entreated me to give her a Bible. Fifty years ago, they could not be bought for the same they now can. I had no way of procuring it, as my parents deemed it necessary to discipline me, by giving me but a trifle for spending money. All the way home I wondered how I could get it. My first resolve was to implore the Lord for it. Quickly I entered my room, and in secret I entreated the Lord to direct me how to procure it, then I watched, and waited for the Lord to instruct me. In a little time after I was sent on an errand, and on entering the street I found the exact sum laying at my feet. I looked up and down the street to see if any one had dropped it, and seeing no one near I picked it up. My whole being bounded with joy, for I knew he who had said, "Ask and it shall be given to you," had verified his precious word to me, and with thanksgiving, and the voice of praise I poured forth my song of joy. I wrote on the first page, A gift from the Lord, to little Mary. When I read it to her, she said, did the Lord send it to me? I told her the way the Lord had led me in procuring the gift, this made it doubly precious to her, and every day she learned a verse, making three hundred and sixty-five verses a year. Her parents were very poor, living in a wretched neighborhood, and dear little Mary's daily work was to wander through the city picking up rags, to help support the family. She could read pretty well for a seven year old girl, having a bright intellect. I cannot tell you the love I had for her, and the sweet sympathy that existed between us. Children beloved, I want you to cultivate the sweet spirit of prayer. Jesus said, suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not. In this way you learn to love Jesus, and when we love him, we are afraid to grieve him, this will give strength, and purpose, to choose the good, and to refuse evil. O then that dearest Prayer, to thee shall all flesh come.

Your affectionate Teacher.

Incomprehensibility of God.

The nature of God is, indeed, beyond our comprehension. Bounded in our intelligence, we do not even comprehend ourselves. What an enigma to us is the soul! Can he who is ignorant of himself reason upon the nature of the Being who made him? The Creator is above all our conceptions; whoever seeks to explain his essence degrades instead of honoring it. Happy he who adores him in silence, sings his praises, and worships his perfections! When the very seraphs are mute before him; shall man, corrupt and sinful, presume to speak before him whose immensity fills the heavens, the earth, and the seas? Everywhere the Divinity may be traced in his works, while he himself is hidden from our eyes. We imagine we have formed an idea of him, but when we would analyze it, lo! it escapes. From the summits to which we raise ourselves, the better to contemplate his attributes, we fall back into the lowest depths of the valley, crushed beneath the weight of his divine majesty. "Canst thou," saith Job, "by searching find out God? Canst thou find the Almighty to perfection?" xi. 7.

But even supposing we were capable of comprehending all mysteries, and all knowledge, how extremely limited is our sphere of observation! We are placed in a remote corner of creation.

What a mere atom is the world which we inhabit, compared with the universal. Even if we knew everything under the sun; nay, if all the powers of nature within our own planetary system, with all the transactions of the whole animated creation which it contains, lay naked and open before us, how ignorant, even then, would we be! Worlds on worlds, and systems on systems, would still be entirely unknown to us.

But how little do we know even of the earth which we inhabit! We are confined to a little spot of this little world. How small are the British Islands, compared to the broad expanse of sea and land! And yet, of this diminutive region, how insignificant is the space with which we are acquainted! And, even of the objects within our view, how ignorant are we! Nay, of the things with which we are most familiar, what do we know? We observe their outward appearance; we can tell what they are to the eye, to the ear, and to the touch: but what they are in their own nature, the greatest philosopher cannot so much as conjecture. Indeed, the very production of organized existences is an impenetrable mystery. Who can define the secret power by which a single blossom of the spring germinates and grows, opening its beauties to the sun, and embalming the air with its perfume?

Compared with this stinted portion of knowledge, how amazing is the knowledge of God! As he made all things, he must be intimately acquainted, not only with their properties, but with their very essence. His eye, at the same instant, surveys all the works of his immeasurable creation; he observes not only the complicated system of the universe, but the slightest motion of the most minute microscopic insect, not only the sublimest conceptions of angels, but the meanest propensity of the most worthless of his creatures; at this moment he is listening to the praises breathed by grateful hearts in distant worlds, and reading every grovelling thought which passes through the polluted minds of the fallen race of Adam.

To his remembrance [illegible] stored not only [illegible] world, [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] come, [illegible] end, [illegible] passed, [illegible] same moment [illegible] eternal eye [illegible] amazing! How [illegible]

But while we thus [illegible] perfections of the Eternal, let us not undervalue the studies by which those perfections are known in part. Though, when compared with the divine mind, the mind even of a Newton must sink into utter insignificance; yet to a feeble man, it is great—it is admirable to have removed the veil which lay on the face of nature—to have pierced, with keen glance, to the suns of other systems, and to have discovered the law, so simple and so sublime, by which the beauty, order, and harmony of the universe are sustained. By enlarging our views of nature, the philosopher enlarges our conceptions of nature's God. He throws new light on the power, the wisdom, and the infinity of the Creator. And this is well, but it is not enough.—Without a higher principle his knowledge is ignorance. his wisdom is folly, his light is darkness. Every discovery which extends our conceptions of the divine power, while it hides from our view the beauty and grace of his paternal character, only places man at a more awful distance from his Maker, and surrounds the throne of the Eternal with new terrors, till, in the full blaze of the Godhead, the corrupted child of earth shrinks, is consumed, is annihilated!

O how unspeakably more cheering and glorious, how infinitely better adapted to our condition and our wants, would be a simple message from the unseen world, intimating favor to the sinful and perishing race of Adam! And that message has been sent. The Almighty has broken the silence of nature, and sent the message by his own Son.—Duncan's Sacred Philosophy of the Seasons.

The best thing to give your enemy is forgiveness; to an opponent, tolerance; to a friend, your heart; to a child, a good example; to a father, deference; to your mother, conduct that will make her proud of you; to yourself, respect; to all men charity.—Mrs. Balfour.

Also a knowledge of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the remission of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

DEADSICK.

And a certain centurion's [illegible], who was dear unto him, was sick, and ready to die. Luke vii. 2.

Deadsiak is the Swedish translation of the entire phrase rendered in our Authorized Version "Sick, and ready to die." While the German—todt krank—is equally as comprehensive, the word de[illegible] strike the English [illegible] with the [illegible] as [illegible] ght [illegible] of [illegible] nan [illegible] and [illegible] as ex- [illegible] nnat then [illegible] oo that sin- [illegible] alone, but we [illegible] Esdras vii. [illegible] [illegible] man mortalized! Such is our fallen race. Sin has entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all. Dying and death involve the race without exemption. Redemption itself is not from dying but from death. "I will ransom them from the power (mar. hand) of the grave; I will redeem them from death," is the divine statement embodying the only hope of deliverance from the horrible doom entailed by transgression of divine law. Resurrection to a new life is lost man's only hope of any existence beyond the "dying and the death." As we study briefly and point, we need not expatiate on the sorrows and heart-aches, on the pangs and tortures, on all the piled-up agonies under which mortalized humanity has writhed and anguished for 6000 years. Glad indeed are we to know that through the redemption in Christ Jesus there is a deliverance from that mortality engendered by the deadly fruit, yet sad to know, at the same time, that the inherent virus may be intensified, by personal sins, into a death-sickness ending in a soul-death that is eternal, and beyond redemption and beyond any recovery. If with the assured hope of living again, and living forever, to be deadsick, and then dead, be terrible, how beyond all description, and beyond all imagination, must it be to be deadsick unto the soul-death—the utter extinguishment of all living. A Rechemer's hand brings up from the "dust and decay" of Hades, but from the consumings of Gehenna there is no resurrection. Deadsick and Soul-Chilled and entombed in the blackness of darkness forever! What a dying, what a death, what a burial. Alas to look upon such death-beds—alas to wander among the sepulchres of some—doomed soul and body to non-entity—some day very soon every memory God will make to perish. Child of the Resurrection, repent be deadsick as to natural life, but thou hast a life hid with Christ in God that will make incorruptible, and immortalize thy redeemed personality brought back from Hades. Rejoice in thy blessed hope, and point the death-smitten to the Divine Life Giver. Beyond the deserts and beyond the tombs are the flowering Paradises of the Heavenly Country; where the tree of life blooms and fruits, and where the streams of life make glad the City of our God. The deadsickness with thee is not to irrecoverable death. The dark river may terrify, as thy feet tread the margin of its dismal floods, but as thou entorest the gloom of the valley and shadow of death, thou wilt see the shining foot-prints of the One that triumphantly passed through the baleful stream. He is alive forevermore; and because he lives, thou shalt live also. From over the flood his words come echoing back—"Fear not; I am the first and the last, and the Living One; and I was dead, and behold, I am alive forevermore, and I have the keys of death and of Hades," Rev. i. 17, 18. R. V. Soon, very soon day will dawn on the night of the grave, and soon, very soon, the saints will all be at Lyus in the summerland of the world to come.

THE ROYALTIES OF THE KINGDOM.

That the kingdom of heaven was at hand was the proclamation of our Lord, of his apostles, and of the seventy others whom he commissioned. As one well says "During the entire life of Christ, neither he, nor his disciples appear to have taught any other doctrine. 'The Kingdom,' or, in other words, the headship of humanity is everywhere offered to the Jews, and to the Jews only—for it was theirs by birth-right. Miracles of beneficence, words such as never man spake, love beyond compare, were all expended with one end only—the convincing, if it were possible, of the chosen people that Jesus, by the testimony of their own prophets was indeed the Messiah; that through him alone the kingdom Would be enjoyed."

Jesus came, as the prophets had predicted he should come, to that people, but the Jews scorned the King and rejected all his claims. The crisis in their history was at length reached. Prophecy, in its fulfillment, came to the final denouement. Riding upon a colt he approaches Jerusalem as the prophet had predicted, "And when he was come nigh, even now at the descent of the Mount of Olives, the whole multitude of the disciples began to rejoice and praise God with a loud voice for all the mighty works that they had seen; saying, Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord: peace in heaven, and glory in the highest." Luke xix. 37, 38; and Zech. ix. 9 But the nation knew not the time of its visitation, and Jesus says "The Kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruit thereof." Matt. xxi. 43. The supremacy of Israel in the kingdom of God as a "princely priesthood" under Messiah was lost forever. The Queenly Bride would be sought elsewhere. The crown and the mitre would be offered to a "called and elected" church from out of all nations. After this memorable scene we hear no more of the kingdom being at hand or being nigh.

The Jewish people were called to embrace the Messiah of God as the Royal Heir, and King of Israel, but as they persistently rejected his claims to the kingdom of God and the throne of David, they failed to become the elected nation, so God determined to call unto himself a church from the Gentiles who should become the worthy sharers with him in all the everlasting glories of Royalty as co-regents with him. The gospel, or the glad tidings of the kingdom, was to be heralded to all nations. "God now visits the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name." Acts xv. 14. It is not the design of the gospel to convert the world, but to call out, discipline, and save a church. "Many are" consequently now "called but few chosen." Not all that get their names on the church books in this world, will be elected into the general assembly and church of the First-born-ones (Firstborn, prototokon—the Greek is plural) who are enrolled in heaven. The kingdom to come will be a "heavenly kingdom." 2 Tim. iv. 18. Its metropolis will be the "heavenly Jerusalem." Heb. xii. 22. The calling to a royalty in this age is "the heavenly calling." Heb. iii. 1. The country will be a "heavenly country," Heb. xi. 16. The finally elected heirs to all these "heavenlies" will themselves bear the "image of the heavenly," 1 Cor. xv. 49. The bodies of these, whose "citizenship is in heaven," will be fashioned anew, and conformed to the body of the Lord Jesus Christ in all its glory, immortality, and incorruptibility. Israel is not lost as a nation because they have lost the crown. All the rest of the world outside of the church are not lost because they can never wear the diadem of glory. In the outcome of God's wonderful plan, the glorified church will bear but a small proportion to the multitudes of the redeemed. In Rev. v. 9, 10 we have a view of the princely priesthood. These are "redeemed out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation." They are the crowned ones. Rev. iv. 10. In Rev. vii. 9-17, we have an innumerable multitude distinguished from these who, are clothed in white robes and who bear palms of victory in their hands, but who are not crowned. Paul well knew that God had not cast away Israel, though the nation had not obtained what it sought for. Only an election gets the royalty, and the rest are blinded. This is only a blindness in part. After the royalty is filled from the Gentiles the Deliverer will turn away ungodliness from Jacob. God has concluded all Israel (an election excepted) in unbelief that he might have mercy upon all. Hence in the age-to-come Israel will be the first of the nations, but the church will be ruatly Israel's superior. Instead of the Elected Church being all that will be saved, they are selected out to be used in the salvation of multitudes. Now in closing these hastily penciled remarks, may we be permitted to say in the spirit of love and meekness, that there can be no doubt that a very definite intelligent faith, a very exact obedience to gospel ordinances exhibiting the obedience of this faith, and a very consecrated life are unchastedly required of all who would wear the crown of glory. Royalty is the high calling. Merely being saved is a very distinct matter. While Israel will, generally, be saved they will weep bitterly by and by over lost crowns. Many called ones may wave palms, but only God's holy elect will ever wear crowns.

O Heavenly Father, by all means give the crowns to the deserving, but give, O give, the writer some humble place of service somewhere in thy everlasting kingdom.

FLORIDA.

Almost every mail brings letters of inquiry relative to Florida, and as the inquiries are much alike I take the liberty of asking permission to answer through the columns of THE RESTITUTION. Though I regret to burden its excellent space with secular matters, but as we "journey to that goodly land" many are interested in finding refuge from the rigors of the northern winter, and a relief from diseases incident to cold climates. First then as to the climate; the present winter has been the coldest known to the "oldest inhabitant," while the north shivering under a temperature of from 30 to 50 below zero, the coldest marked by our thermometer here was 22 above zero, this temperature however was cold enough to form ice, and to freeze the fruit left on orange trees, winter vegetables also suffered severely from the cold, but the loss outside of this has been comparatively light. But little damage has been done to the orange trees, nursery stock suffered the heaviest loss, but much of that will sprout from the roots. I gave the temperature for 17 days in Jan. 1885, the average was 66. The present winter with the exception of the "cold snap" has been almost as pleasant. Calamities may prove in the end to be blessings in disguise, so we regard the disastrous cold weather of Florida, it will encourage a diversified use of the soil that some had about concluded was made expressly for orange culture. Thousands of acres hitherto lying idle will now be cultivated, and food that formerly was brought from the north will be raised at home.

The summer temperature ranged from 60 to 103, but the heat is beautifully tempered by the salt breezes that fan us from both the Gulf and Atlantic. Another modifier of the summer heat is the abundant rainfall, showers being almost daily from May to September. The soil here may be classed in three grades. Light sandy soil of the pine lands, black vegetable soil found in basins or depressions in the land, and hammock soil, the latter being the richest in plant food. The light soil after the timber is deadened and the land cultivated is a crop or two of cow peas will produce moderate crops, and responds promptly to fertilizers. The second class named is rich in humus and produces all growths peculiar to this climate.

The country is abundantly supplied with timber, millions of feet of southern pine suitable for all purposes that lumber can be applied to. The hammock furnishes the hardest and toughest woods I ever found, live oak and hickory. Good water, but not cold is found at depths ranging from 10 to 50 feet. No government land to be taken in this part of the state, but homestead claims of 160 acres can be bought of the present occupants at from $500 to $2000 with a cabin and a few acres of cleared land. This land will produce as fine oranges as any in the state. Improved land or land with grove of bearing orange trees rates all the way from $500 to $1500 per acre of bearing trees. It requires from 6 to 9 years for four or two year old stock from the nursery to bear, the cultivation here being but little more expensive than that of a northern apple orchard. the trees existing at the nursery 25 cents for four year old stock, two year old stock from 10 to 15 cents. The orange tree is a hardy vigorous grower.

The products of this country are so numerous that the list would be a long one. The following comprises what I have seen growing since I came here: Corn, oats, rye, buck-wheat, millet, millo maize, sweet potatoes, Irish potatoes, cabbage, turnips, onions, lettuce, beets, tomatoes, cucumbers, of fruits Le Conte pear, honey and peach peach, plum, fig, grape, blackberry, raspberry, certain varieties of apples are said to do well here. Now to all contemplating a visit to this country let me give a word of advice, do not expect too much, this is not Paradise restored, the curse extends over every foot of this rebellious earth, but to those who wish a lovely winter climate, and are willing to put money, muscle, and brain to work here I believe the investment will be a good one, but if you are not willing to endure the hardships and hard work incident to all new countries, do not come, for that class of people never did and never will make new country. The standard of God's truth that I fling aloft is waving in the breeze and I thank God that around that standard I see help rallying, Bro. and Sr. Hollsback are now our nearest neighbors, and a Bro. in Penn., has sent two sons here to locate a home for the family, and I pray that God's blessing may attend the efforts we are making to get the truth before the people here. The pine woods resound with the sweet words "How sweet are the tidings, etc." as we pass from our meetings homeward, bringing up recollections of the days when the truth was planted in Fulton Co. Oh brother in Christ has the flame that blazed so brightly then become dim, or has the light entirely died out? O arise and trim your lamp, for lo the Master's at hand! Yes, "He's coming, soon I know."

Yours waiting for the kingdom of God. J. F. WAGONER.

Editor Restitution:

Find enclosed two dollars to apply on THE RESTITUTION. You know we love it and could not do without it after reading its pages so long. It's all the preaching we have had of the Abrahamic faith since last April, when Bro. C. C. Ramsay held a few days' meeting for us. The encouraging pieces from our brothers and sisters in Christ scattered abroad throughout the country gives us courage to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. If any of our preaching brethren coming this way would call and hold a meeting for us, we would be very thankful. I will try to get some subscribers for THE RESTITUTION on the three months subscription list, but have not as yet.

Yours in the Faith and Hope.

J. M. SHIPMAN.

Editor Restitution:

I am spreading THE RESTITUTION abroad where and when ever I can find one who will, I think appreciate it. In this place is an M. E. Church, and some of the members agree about Christ coming again and other topics of like interest. Some I have talked with here seem to be somewhat in earnest, at least in their way. There is many a well meaning one amongst them. The Presiding Elder, Mr. Wyble, seems to be an earnest worker. As I sat listening to him one evening spunking on "'Tis not him that saith Lord, Lord, but him that doeth the will of my Father," he remarked that we should not only be doers but workers, and not Christians from the lips out but from the heart. I wish some good preaching brother would happen along this way. If we were not hard up for money we would willingly contribute, but as it is we must wait, but we must be thoroughly alive to our work for soon the night cometh when man cannot work.

We have had our storm here. A terrific wind uprooting trees, prostrating fences, etc. In San Francisco and Los Angeles it was much worse. No lives lost here as far as I know of. I saw an article in one of the San Francisco dailies about the Euphrates river saying that it was gradually losing, and if it would keep on much longer fears were entertained that inhabitants living along its banks would be left dry without any communication by water. Never was I so struck with Revelation so forcibly as when it speaks of the drying up of its waters, to prepare a way that the Kings of the East might pass over. Literal or figurative it is worthy of study. What a severe winter this has been, over 36 inches of rain has fallen here so far, and terrible storms elsewhere, cold weather and snow east of the Rockies, floods in Europe, and strife amongst the nations. The great upheaval among the working classes, and here the Anti-Coolie movement, with murders, suicides, embezzlement, etc. Verily we are living in the close of Gentile rule. Something must be done soon. Brethren let us offer up our prayers that each and every one of us be kept from the temptations that compass us on all sides. THOMAS HUGHES.

Editor Restitution:

Please find enclosed two dollars to pay on my subscription. We have had some good meetings held here at Plum River the last three months by Bro. T. J. Whitsitt, from Iowa. He immersed seven into the all-saving Name of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. This makes eighteen immersed here the last year. There is a good interest awakened among the people, more persons have signified their willingness to be immersed when he comes back. Bro. Whitsitt is to preach for us over two Sundays in each month till May. This sound like times of rejoicing such as we have seen many years ago. May our Heavenly Father add his blessings to the word spoken, that it may bring forth fruit and in the end eternal life, which is the gift of God. Yours in the one hope. SIMON P. RENNER

Editor Restitution:

Bro. L. C. Chase, of Adrian, Mich., has been holding meetings here. In the Brick School House, three and one-half miles north of Mendon village. The meetings commenced the evening of Feb. 13, and closed Feb. 21. Although the weather was bad we had a good attendance all through the meetings. Bro. Chase preached the gospel of the kingdom according to the Scriptures, in a fair manner, so that all could understand. Good attention was given, and many showed a great interest in the subjects presented, and promised to investigate still further to see if these things are so. We feel confident that a great amount of good will come from the meetings just closed. The people seem to be awakened to an interest never before shown at this place. Bro. Chase is a man that leaves a good impression upon the minds of the people where ever he goes. Bro. L. H. Cheebrough was with us all through the meetings.

I remain as ever, your Bro. of the one faith. H. L. PERRY.

Editor Restitution:

Since my acquaintance with THE RESTITUTION I have sought to extend its circulation, but it is up hill business. Some are afraid to read anything that leads outside the old beaten track of their fathers. Others have as much reading matter as they have time to read, and some seem not to care to read anything, but my wife has succeeded in getting four names. I think THE RESTITUTION ought to be supported, and I wish it could circulate throughout the world, for I think [illegible] in the very last days of [illegible] Christ says, "When I [illegible] find faith on the earth?" There [illegible] was a time, it seems to me, when infidelity was so largely on the increase as the present. Men have sprung up and the world looks to them as the great men of the age, who have written largely, and have lectured extensively, to show by scientific demonstrations that the Bible is not a true book. Now, my dear Brother, unless those men can be met, and met with evidence that the world cannot overthrow, we must take the back seat, for they are having a powerful influence. Wilford A. Hall, of New York, has attempted to meet them, but he is as deep in the mud as they are in the mire, that is on the subject of the immortality of the soul. I cannot but think that our preaching brethren, and the writers of THE RESTITUTION very much neglect to dwell upon the evidences of the truth of the Bible. No one need go into the Bible for evidence to prove it true; there is a great amount of evidence outside of the Bible to prove it true beyond the power of all the infidels in creation to set aside, and it should be forthcoming and dwelt upon, that the mouths of the scoffers might be shut. I have for a long time been very anxious to write, but I have deferred writing for certain reasons, but O, my dear Brother, could I but see you—and I would see you very soon if I had the means to bear my expenses—and have a long talk with you about many things which seem to me are going wrong, which things, to my mind, are of the greatest importance. Also I would like to consult you upon some points that I am not as yet fully established. Could I see you I think you could help me.

May the Lord spare your life and health to conduct THE RESTITUTION for many years.

Yours fully in the faith,

L. V. NORTH.

Enclosed find one dollar. I do not feel like doing without the paper, as it all the preaching that I have the privilege of hearing. I tried to get a subscriber or two for three months, but this is wholly a sectarian neighborhood, and one neighbor said that they did not want anything different from Methodism taught, so you see that there is not much chance for one who teaches the coming and Kingdom of Christ, as taught in the Scriptures. I thank Sister A. Mix for her good and Christ-like letter which I read in THE RESTITUTION. I do not think that any one who makes a sacrifice for Christ will ever loose anything by it, not even in this world. I think that the paper gets better each year. There is more of a Christian spirit prevailing—more practice and less doctrine, which is needed now. The Methodists have been having a protracted meeting here, which lasted some two weeks, and they have taken in about forty members. They went through rain and mud day and night. Now brethren, I think we can learn a lesson from them in some things. They possess the zeal without the true knowledge, while we possess the knowledge without enough zeal. These things ought not to be. We ought to have at least one paper which is self-sustaining. If we desire any worldly thing we do not rest until we find some way to get it, and are we to be less zealous in the cause of our Master? May we all possess more of the spirit of our blessed Master, is the prayer of your unworthy sister,

Let us thank God and take courage, for the truth is spreading here. We enjoy all dear Brother Colgrove writes and always have. I too can admire [illegible] for his reasons for silence." We are often so delighted with some of the contributors, as to wish we know their address that we might thank them for good received, and thus cheer and encourage to greater effort. It is encouraging to see some good resultings from our labors. Bro. Chas. Gardoor's "Uriah Heepism," was timely and just what was needed here. I handed it to a minister, who said, "that one piece is worth $10 to me," and without being asked, subscribed for the paper. We need two dictionaries to understand all he writes. But we know that such papers must have food adapted to all capacities. We send heartfelt greetings to all the dear scattered ones who are trying to overcome and who are not "keeping back part of the price," but are acting as faithful stewards—that they may be of the "little flock," to whom it is said, "fear not, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom," and whom he bids "be of good cheer, I have overcome." "My grace is sufficient for you." Let us lift up our heads knowing our redemption draweth near. Surely the signs indicate the glorious day is dawning and we are rejoicing.

As ever, your devoted Sister in Christ. MRS. P. A. STRONG.

Editor Restitution:

I desire to say that the paper has very much endeared to us its good Editor, as well as many of its contributors though we never seen any of them. It will however be one of the glad tidings in store for us in the kingdom to know and make the acquaintance of one another, but higher and better it will be to see him who became poor in order to make us rich.

Yours watching for the blessed appearing. CALEB DAVIES.

Enclosed you will find one dollar for THE RESTITUTION. I am sorry that I could not send more but will try and do better in the future. We have no preaching of the faith of THE RESTITUTION here, and no church. We have several other kind. Myself and husband are members of the Christian Church, but we are not satisfied, as to our being all right. We would be glad to have a preacher come to our town now and I think a good congregation could be organized. I wrote to Bro. Ramsay last year, and was hopeful he would come to us. We are not financially able to pay one to come, but hope the way may open yet for us. ### The Newspaper.

No newspaper can take the place of a profound treatise on theology, or ethics, or philosophy, or church history we must have those, of course; but at the same time the newspaper, representing the substance of what has been contained in the treatise, and putting it into form for general currency, gives wings to the thought which has elsewhere been more largely and finely elaborated. The mint-master who sets upon the coin its stamp, with the proper superscription, and puts it into general circulation in the world, has his important and valuable office as well as the miner who has dug the gold from the earth, or blasted it from the rock. The man from whom we get the coal for my winter fireside blaze, or who distills that coal into the light which change night into day among the great avenues of the city, has his place in the world, and an important one, as well as the smart miner who has dug out the coal from under the base of the towering mountain. And the journal which gives currency to truth and thought, as these have been elaborated in the profound or careful treatise, having access to multitudinous minds, gives wings to the treatise. The newspaper cannot take the place, either, of oral discourse, in which the spirit of the speaker, touched by a Divine fire, goes forth upon his utterance. Our Master wrote no sentence, so far as we are informed—unless he wrote one in the sand He spoke much, and he said himself that the words spoken by him were to outlive the heavens and the earth. Preaching is to convert the world, under the Divine grace, and not newspapers. But where the elaborate treatise exists, and where the inspiring preaching is found, there the newspaper becomes—if it be right in religious tone, and right in its religious teaching—a constant and invaluable auxiliary power, giving strength to the hand, giving warmth to the heart, giving vision to the brain, of him who teaches from the pulpit, of those who bear office in the church, or of those associated in its fellowship.—*R. ### NOTES ON ANASTASIS.—NO. 2.

Here I wish to give a lengthy extract, that those who have not a copy of Anastasis at hand, may see on what an absurd, and wholly assumed foundation the doctrine of mortal emergence is based. The author says: "But Paul says, in the last trumpet that shall sound the dead ones shall be raised incorruptible. So it reads in the common version. (Please turn and see if it does), and if the words be understood in the sense indicated by the apostle, there cannot be the least objection to it. He assumed a truth which was afterward apocalyptically represented to John in Patmos; that is the period symbolized by the seventh trumpet—the dead shall be caused to exist incorruptible. This is the import of the word rendered 'shall be raised' in this text. It includes the whole process of rebuilding—from the awakening to the quickening when the subject of the finished operation can shout aloud with joy and exclaim 'I am immortal, Hallelujah!' This will be seen in any lexicon under the word egeiro. Among the definitions are, 'to raise up or again,' 'to rebuild,' 'to cause to exist.' The raising of an edifice is not began and consummated in an instant. It is the pleasure of the Deity who is the builder of all things, to execute his purposes with deliberation. He lays the foundation of the house, which is from heaven, in the dust. This foundation is the body which springs forth therefrom; while the superimposed building is the white robe of immortality, the house from heaven with which it is arrayed—in the panoply of which it dwells. Hence, raising in the text is not an instantaneous act, as though the body shot forth from the dust incorruptible and immortal, but a process consisting of divers successive stages. These are all developed, in, or during the sounding of the seventh or last trumpet, but the interval to elapse between the beginning and the finishing of the process is no where revealed. It will doubtless be sufficiently long, to allow scope for the gathering into Christ, and the judgment of His house, which is to follow. They are caused to exist when they come forth from their graves, but they are not caused to exist incorruptible until they have been approved at his tribunal. Thus, from these premises it may be perceived, that the raising of the righteous, is the exaltation of them from a lower, to a higher nature. (Note—If this be so, then the saints who are alive and remain unto the coming of Christ will be left in their lower nature, for they are not raised. It is only the dead are raised. What then is the portion of all those just ones according to the foregoing and following logic?) The lower nature is that exhibited by Adam on the day of his formation. It was good, very good of its kind, but not equal to the nature of the Elohim. This is the higher nature and styled by Paul the spiritual body. * * * * From the one, to the other, is an ascent, and he who ascends from an earthly body to a heavenly is said to have been raised."

The first error in this quotation is the inappropriate use of the word in for at. It should be, and is, according to our best authorities, "at the last trump." The original word here used is "en"—and not "kata," which signifies during. We are told immediately before just how long a space of time, this raising of the dead will occupy, viz: "a moment, the twinkling of an eye." 1 Cor. xv. 52. The next error is in [illegible] used in the [illegible] The word [illegible] in the text [illegible] signifies [illegible] word beneath. [illegible] architectural [illegible]rd, or applied [illegible] speaking of [illegible]ed. There is [illegible]ire building the [illegible]ressed in the whole [illegible]on. The author says, "This includes the whole process of re-building from the awakening to the quickening." Here it is very evident there is a strange confusion of thought. To quicken is to make alive, not to arouse from sleep. It is reversing the established order of things to speak of awakening and then quickening. It would be quite impossible for a dead body to awaken first and then be quickened.

Next he contradicts the plain language of the apostle, as I have already quoted, and he says, " " " "raising in the text is not an instantaneous act as though a body shot forth from the dust incorruptible and immortal, but a process consisting of divers stages." Of this assertion he gives no proof texts; he has none to give. Neither the word stage nor the word process is anywhere used in speaking of the resurrection of the dead. Another contradiction of the Scriptures is thus expressed "they are caused to exist when they come forth from their graves; but they are not caused to exist incorruptible."

From the premises he lays down, which are entirely in opposition to the Scripture, resurrection is but an ascending from a lower to a higher nature, therefore those who are not resurrected, viz: all who are alive and remain, will not be affected, but remain he does not tell us where; but leaves it an open question whether they will be banished into the shades of oblivion or not. These are the primary principles of mortal emergence as set forth in Anastasis. But we must hasten on to see the more advanced stages of the utterly groundless theory.

Next he speculates on a subject of which he knows nothing, because nothing is revealed, i. e., what Adam's fate would have been if he had not sinned.

Page 14, he says: "The resurrection or raising of Jesus from the lower nature with which he emerged from the tomb—to the divine nature, his house from heaven: the white robe of Spirit in which he was taken up, supplies the deficiencies in the case of the first Adam, and exhibits to his brethren the stages of the arising process, they have to pass through, before it can be said they are like him." 1 John iii. 2. We find no such language as this in the record of Jesus's life, death, resurrection and glorification. There is no proof offered. It is all assumption, as well as that which follows, viz: The first stage is the formation of their dust after the image and likeness of the first Adam, which were Elohistic; and their being Elohistically formed to be caused to exist, by the breath of lives being breathed into their nostrils.

That this is the most unwarranted speculation, of which the Book gives not the slightest evidence, none can doubt, who read for themselves regardless of the opinions of leaders. There is no record that any living form of humanity has been, or ever will be, brought to life by the infusion of breath into the nostrils, but the first Adam! To assume that Jesus was thus brought back to life is to deny plain testimony already quoted. We are not told that Jesus passed through any stages, or processes. The angels said nothing about it, neither did the apostles. It is a discovery of the nineteenth century that might better have remained where Inspiration left it—unrevealed! 1 John iii. 2. is cited as proof—It reads: Beloved, now are we children of God; and it is not yet made manifest what we shall be. We know that if he shall be manifested; we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. This disproves the theory sought to be established; for we are plainly told that we are the children of God now, and that we know when he shall appear we shall be like him. We are not told we will have to wait through stages and processes in a state of expectancy. No, no, no. In the references next given, Rom. xiv. 10, "But thou, why dost thou judge thy brother? or thou again, why dost thou set at nought (or disfellowship) thy brother, for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of God." So, then, each one of us shall give account of himself to God; verse 12. In this letter Paul was exhorting the Romans who had embraced the faith to live more practically the precepts he had taught them. He admonishes them not to judge one another in meats and drinks, etc., and then tells them, verse 9, "For this end Christ died and lived again, that he might be Lord (or judge) of both the dead and the living." He, Christ, will judge the quick and dead at his appearing and kingdom. Paul is talking to those only, who are in Christ. Matt. xxiv. 31. And he shall send forth his angels with a trumpet of great sound, and they shall gather together his elect, from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other. Here we must see that it is only the elect, God's elect, that are gathered. 2 Thes. ii. 1. Now we beseech you brethren, touching the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ; and by our gathering together unto him; to the end that ye be not quickly shaken from your mind, nor yet be troubled, either by spirit, or by word or by epistle, as from us, as that the day of the Lord is just at hand. Here, too, it is only the saints are spoken of being gathered together, for they did not include the wicked in "our gathering," etc. In all these texts it will be plainly seen that there is not the slightest intimation that the events referred to transpire while men are in a mortal condition.

Next in Anastasis we read of the second stage in the process of resurrection. Having emerged from sheol, from the womb of the dawn, the second stage of the process finds them after the type of the first Adam, standing before the judgment seat of Christ, Rom. xiv. 10, as the result of being angelically gathered together unto him. Matt. xxiv. 31; 2 Thes. ii. 1. Adam, at the bar of paradise, had arrived there through probation, and emergency from a hiding place, whence he had been brought forth by the voice of Yahwah Elohim, Gen. iii. 1, 9, so with his descendants: they arrive at the judgment seat of Christ through probation and emerge from sheol in which they had been long hid, and from which the voice of Elohim brings them forth, that every one of them may give an account of himself to Deity. Rom. xiv. 12. There is no proof to be found in any of these texts of a second stage in the process of resurrection. Neither are we anywhere told that Adam hiding himself from the presence of the Lord when he had disobeyed is a type of our burial; and his coming forth at the call of the Lord, a type of our judgment after death. There is no resemblance between the two events on which to suppose for a moment a typical significance could be based. Adam in his primal condition was not placed as any of the race have been since. He was put within sight and reach of the means of attaining to life immortal. Faith did not enter into his probation as into ours, neither did death intervene between his transgression and his coming forth to his account, nor could the accounts have been in any respect similar. Therefore the assumed parallel, fails for want of support, leaving both type and antitype in the second stage in the process of resurrection, in the same deplorable condition, i. e., in the realms of fancy.

Page 15. Having left those who have sown to the flesh to reap corruption, the writer goes on to say: "When those who have sown to the Spirit appear at the judgment seat of Christ, they will be able to show, in account rendered, that the righteousness of the Mosaic law was fulfilled in them, by their walk after the Spirit, which is the truth, through which they mortified the deeds of the body and crucified it, with its affections and lusts."

The thought here presented has no foundation in the Book. We are not in it anywhere told that the righteous will come forth and show, or try to show, that they have walked according to the Mosaic law. Gal. iii. 19, tells us that the law was given because of transgression, till the seed should come. None will deny that this seed is the Christ. Again in Gal. iii. 21: For if there had been a law given which could make alive, verily righteousness would have been by the law. But there is no law by which life eternal may be obtained. Why then talk of the righteous coming up in judgment assuming that they have kept the Mosaic Law? Then he says, "They are gathered there as hopeful expectants, of a verdict justifying them before angels and the Father who is in heaven. Matt. x. 32; Luke xii. 8, 9." The first text reads, Every one therefore who shall confess me before men, him will I also confess before my Father who is in heaven. The second text, Luke xii. 8, 9: And I say unto you, every one who shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of man also confess, before the angels of God. But he that denieth me in the presence of men, shall be denied in the presence of God. In neither text is there any intimation that either the righteous or the wicked will utter one word. Nor is there any foundation for supposing that the righteous will appear as hopeful expectants. No, it is plainly taught us in the Word that if we accept of Christ by faith, and walk in his precepts, we may know that there is a crown awaiting us just as truly as there was for Paul, and he said, henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day, and not to me only, but also unto all them that love his appearing. Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen. Again, What a man seeth why doth he yet hope for, and yet again, We know that when he shall appear we shall be like him for we shall see him as he is. This will be our condition immediately on his appearance, if we accept the language of the Bible as we do any other book.

Suppose that word be officially sent to the captives now in exile in Siberia, that the Czar will come there, about a certain time, and that when they see him appear with all his royal courtiers, that they shall then be free men, as he is free. Will they fear to remain longer in exile? Will they expect to go through any formal trial to evidence, to, to prove to the residents of that region that the Czar is right? That such is his pleasure? What cares he, the proud autocrat, for the opinions of those whom he can, at any moment, send into exile? And shall we dare presume that the Judge of all the earth will deem it necessary to arraign prisoners of hope, as though they were prisoners for crime? Nay, verily. When the Light appears, faith and hope is lost in sight: and the everlasting glory is entered upon.

Page 18. 1 John ii. 15; James iv. 4, and Heb. x. 27, are quoted apparently to try to prove that the unjust stand up waiting their sentence. The first reads, Love not the world neither the things of the world. If any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him. The second is, Ye who break your marriage vow to God, know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God. (Revised Version). The next is, For if we sin willfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more a sacrifice for sin; but a certain fearful expectation of judgment and fierceness of fire which shall devour the adversary.

The first two texts here cited have no bearing whatever on the subject, and the last plainly shows that the matter is settled at once and forever, when one sins willfully after having known the truth. The judgment is settled, but the manifestation of that judgment is the thing to be looked for. The culprit will have no opportunity of pleading his case.

2 Tim. iv. 1, 8, is referred to here, to try to prove that both the just and unjust are brought forth to judgment at the appearing of our Savior. "I charge thee therefore before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and dead at his appearing and his kingdom." Here it is perfectly evident that reference is made to the living saints, the quick, and the sleeping saints, the dead in Christ, and no others.

Fallen Asleep.

Two more of our number have gone to their resting place. Mary E. Searight, of an ailment of the windpipe which lasted only a few days, died Dec. 22, 1885, at her home near Pleasanton, Linn Co., Kan., at the age of 43 years. She was born in the State of Illinois and moved to Kansas in 1866. In 1861 she was united in marriage to Isaac L. Searight, in which they lived together till death separated them as above stated, Dec. 22, 1885. In fifty days from that time Isaac L. Searight, husband of Mary E. Searight, of pneumonia fever, fell asleep Feb. 12, 1886. After only a few days of suffering death ended all pains. He was 48 years of age. Brother Searight was born in the State of Indiana. In 1858 he with his parents removed to Linn Co., Kan. In 1861 he was married to Mary E. Ford. They two have had to undergo many trials during the bloody war of the rebellion in the United States. But through all of them the Lord has protected them. But at last the enemy death broke into their peaceable family. Mother had to go first, and fifty days later father had to go. Four dear children were left behind to mourn the loss of their dear parents. They both held with us in faith and were highly esteemed by all who knew them. They were loved best by those who knew them best.

I have been acquainted with the family about twelve years and have preached in the neighborhood more or less ever since. Brother and Sister Searight's house was ever open for Jesus and his friends. I cannot now recollect that I ever preached in that vicinity but what Brother Searight was almost making fires, furnishing [illegible], and I do not know of [illegible] would be missed any [illegible] will be, both by the [illegible] the people of his township, as he was highly respected by all who knew him.

A funeral discourse was delivered by the writer. Text was Job xiv. 14, "If a man die shall he live again. All the days of my appointed time till my change come." And Job xvii. 13, "If I wait the grave is my house." From these two verses and other Scriptures we showed that man would die and that he would have to wait in the grave. We spoke just one hour to a large crowd of attentive listeners. Having the reality of death before us that no one could dispute, as our dear brother was lying before us in his coffin, the same Isaac L. Searight who was known by nearly all the people in Potosa Township, no one could deny the reality of death, and the only hope of a future life was through a resurrection from the dead. The writer closed with the comforting words of Paul to the Thessalonians, 1 Thess. iv. 13-end of chapter, "Wherefore comfort one another with these words." And 1 Cor. xv. 50-end of chapter. We need only to add that tears were shed by nearly all who took a last look at our highly esteemed brother while a song was sung by the writer.

Most blissful thought, and can it be
That I shall live again,
And be from sin forever free,
No sorrow nor no pain?

Last verse,

Death shall be banished from the place,
Our Savior then shall pledge,
There we shall see him face to face,
And never sin again.

We also sang,

We may sleep, but not forever,
There will be a glorious dawn.

These were some of Brother and Sister Searight's favorite songs.

Well, they will be missed by the dear children and also by old Mother Searight—the mother of Isaac—and the brothers and sisters in the flesh, and the brethren and sisters in the Lord, and by the neighbors in general. But we need not to mourn as those that are without hope. This was the second shock I received when I came to Prescott to hold meetings. The first was the time that Sister Kinsey died or fell asleep. Just as I got off the cars at Prescott I was met by Brother and Sister Brimhall. Nearly their first words were, "We have just buried Sister Kimsey." Then on the 13th day of February, 1886, just as I got off the train I met Brethren Kimsey and Perry with the sad news, "Brother Isaac Searight is dead."

O, dear brethren, one by one we fall! Soon our turn will come, as I feel that preaching is wearing on me I have so many calls to fill. I am considerably in debt and it troubles me some. When I go home I will have to work very hard to get along at all. Well, brethren, let us take warning by the death of so many of our own brethren and sisters that we must all go one by one whether we own much of this world's goods or not. May the Lord God cause you all to wake up to a sense of your duty, and may we all live so that we may all meet in the kingdom of God, is my prayer. Yours in hope of eternal life.

JOHN FOORE.

Michigan Conference Report.

The First Quarterly Conference of the Church of God, began Friday evening, Feb. 19, 1886, at the Winchester School House. The weather was not very favorable, but the house was well filled during the entire Conference, and all who loved the Bible truths felt that a part of the Father's family was gathered in to enjoy a few crumbs from the Master's table.

The services were all very enjoyable. The preaching was done by brethren Houser, Bennett, Winchester and Woodward. Sunday evening closed the Conference session with the emblems of the Master's broken body and spilled blood. Several from different localities were unable through sickness to be present, but all such were remembered in our prayers, and may God add his blessing to the faithful little band of worshippers at Byron, who are so nobly working, though midst so much opposition. It was often said during the Conference, that never before had the Byron Church seemed so fully awake to, and so zealously working for the truth as now.

May God help them and all of us to work on faithfully to the end.

MARY A. WOODWARD.

Families Going West

To settle permanently, or visit, naturally seek the routes by which they can travel with the greatest comfort and with the fewest changes of cars. The favorite Ft. Wayne Route, known as the Northwest System of the Pennsylvania Lines west of Pittsburgh, offers greater facilities in this respect than any other Line, as it runs Baggage Cars, Coaches and Sleeping Cars from Pittsburgh to Chicago without change, making connection through Union Depots with the trains of Roads leading to all points in the West, Northwest and Southwest. These are great advantages to families with ladies and children, and particularly to ladies traveling without escort. For rates of fare, rates on household goods, time tables, etc., write to the nearest Ticket Agent of the Pennsylvania Lines, or to E. A. Ford, General Passenger Agent, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Miscellaneous.

The peace of Europe involves $870,752,822 annual outlay of the various states for the maintenance of their army and navy. If to this amount should be added the annual interest of that portion of the debt of the different States which, directly or indirectly, was caused by the necessities for military and naval purposes—namely, a sum of $1,003,799,670—the cost of the European peace may be set down at the enormous aggregate of $1,874,552,502.

J. S. McKnight, of Lawrence, Kan., has a medal which he found in the grave of an Indian near Warrenburg, Mo. It is of a round shape, somewhat larger than a dollar, and was made of silver. On one side is pressed the image of the founder of Democracy, surrounded with "Thos. Jefferson, President of the United States, A. D. 1801." On the reverse side are two clasped hands, with just above them a pipe, a tomahawk and the words "Peace and Friendship."

Colonel Prejavalsky, the explorer who, under the guise of a scientist, was sent by the Czar to spy out regions desirable for annexation to the Russian Empire, has returned to St. Petersburg after a two years' sojourn in Mantchooria and Tibet. His most important achievements in the cause of science seem to have been the shooting of more than 400 inoffensive natives who objected to becoming the compulsory hosts of his Cossack retainers, and the giving Russian names to various places within the boundaries of the Chinese Empire.

Pierre Grevy, the hermit of Hootowl Pond near St. Regis Falls, in Franklin county, N. Y., was found dead in his hut several days ago, by two hunters who were following a bear. He came from Quebec in 1832, built his hut against a great rock, and had lived there since, going to town twice a year for supplies, and paying for them in French silver coin of the reign of Napoleon Bonaparte. His beard grew to his waist, and his hair when unbraided dragged on the ground. His finger nails were nearly three inches long. Among his effects were three small portraits—one of Napoleon, one of Josephine, and one of Marshal Ney. Papers written in French gave his birthplace as Marseilles, 1790. A marriage certificate of Pierre Grevy to Marie Gauthier was also found, and this sentence in an old book: "Thank God, Jules Grevy is President of the French Republic." It is thought from the papers found he was a great uncle of Jules Grevy.

Operations have been lately begun for the purpose of clearing away the mass of sand which has accumulated during centuries around the famous statute of the Sphinx. Brugsch Bey, brother of the distinguished Egyptologist, has charge of the work, which is being carried on according to a plan proposed by Signor Maspero, and will, it is expected, be finished by Easter. The portion of the statue at present above ground is about 40 feet. It is supposed that as much more, at least, is buried in the sand, and the amount of sand to be cleared away is estimated at 20,000 cubic metres. A small tramway is being constructed to carry away this mass of sand to a distance, and 150 laborers are employed on the task. When the statue has been laid bare to the level of the foundations a broad circular walk will be constructed around it, and a high wall be built to guard against future encroachments of the sands of the deserts.

DISTANCE OF THE SUN.

Mr. David Gill, the English astronomer, who went in 1877 to the Island of Ascension for the purpose of using the favorable opposition of Mars to ascertain the distance of that planet from the earth, and indirectly the distance of the sun, has informed the Royal Astronomical Society that the reduction of his observations of Mars have been so far completed that he is able to find the resulting solar parallax. He finds this to be 8".78, which being interpreted on the basis of Colonel Clarke's last determination of the earth's equatorial semi-diameter, implies that the mean distance of the earth from the sun is 92,101,000 miles. This is a smaller parallax than was generally looked for, though not differing materially from several others which have been worked out recently. Professor Newcomb's determination of the parallax was 8".848; Leverrier's later result was 8".86.

THE NOVEMBER METEORS.

Professor Daniel Kirkwood, of Bloomington, Ind., an excellent authority on meteors, thus explains the origin and nature of the meteoric showers of August and November. The November stream crosses the earth's path, and hence at times encounters the earth. The meteoric matter striking our atmosphere with a velocity of more than twenty mi... second is rendered luminous ... collision, and is generally di... long before reaching the earth's face. A remarkable difference betwe... the streams of August and Novemb... has been noticed by all who have st... fied the phenomena. The matter of t... former is spread entirely around ... orbit so that meteors are seen in o... siderable numbers every year abo... the 9th or 10th of the month. That ... of the latter is chiefly collected in a single cluster, whose period of revolution is about thirty-three years. The great showers occur, therefore, but three times in a century. Many persons still living will remember the wonderful rain of fire on the 13th of November, 1833. The writer, who was then teaching a country school in York county, Pa., met persons on the following day who expressed great curiosity to see how the heavens would appear the next night, as all the stars were believed to have fallen.

The shower of 1866 in Europe, and that of 1867 in America, were quite remarkable, but far inferior to that of 1833, when the earth probably passed through the most dense part of the cluster. Another very brilliant shower need not be expected till 1899 or 1900. The fact, however, of the existence of two minor groups moving in the same orbit has been clearly indicated. One of these crossed the earth's path in 1862 or 1863, and hence a slight display may again be looked for about 1880. The third group furnished a considerable number of meteors in 1879 and 1880. But although many meteors are not expected for some years to come, it is important that watch be kept and observations recorded, in order that the relative destinies of different portions of the stream may be determined. The point from which they radiate is Leo, and the time for observation is from midnight to daylight on the morning of November 14.

WRIGHT.—On Monday, February 22, at 10 o'clock, of croup, Harold Verne, only child of B. F. and Emma Weaver Wright, aged 2 years, 8 months and 13 days.

Yes death has come to our home and robbed us of our darling boy. Oh dear, when we look about the room and see our darling's playthings, his little chairs and empty crib, it seems that our hearts will surely break, but we mourn not as those who have no hope. We believe that Jesus is coming soon to set up his glorious kingdom, and if we are faithful, we shall meet our loved ones, to die no more. Yes there will be no such picture as crape on the door and wreathes of flowers strewn around our dear ones, when our hot tears fall, for God will wipe away all tears from our eyes. Dear brethren and sisters, pray for us, that we may be worthy of the kingdom of God, is the sincere prayer of your sister in Christ.

CAST THY BREAD UPON THE WATERS.

Cast thy bread upon the waters,
Thou shalt find it after many days.

Cast thy bread upon the waters,
Deeds of love shall bear their fruit;
Scatter blessings like the morning,
Thou shalt reap the harvest sure.

Cast thy bread upon the waters,
Thou shalt find it by and by;
Kindly sow the seed at random,
Trust the Lord to watch the sky.

Cast thy bread upon the waters,
Weary souls shall call thee blest;
Thou shalt prove the Lord's own promise,
And His word shall stand the test.

Cast thy bread upon the waters,
Where the tide is ebbing low;
Where the parching sands are gasping
For the life-refreshing flow.

Cast thy bread upon the waters,
Where the mighty billows roll;
Where the treacherous current hurries
Human barks to sin and dole.

Cast thy bread upon the waters,
Thou shalt find it by and by;
Kindly sow the seed at random,
Trust the Lord to watch the sky.

THE BABYLONIANS AT HOME.

When the first explorers on the Mesopotamian mounds brought to light the long-buried remains of the Nineveh and Babylonian Empires, it naturally enough aroused excitement chiefly to the plastic monuments which so rewarded the zeal of the research. Hardly anything was then known of the language, which was written in cuneiform characters. But Assyrian and Babylonian sculpture does not possess the richness of ancient Egypt; the bulls and the eagle-headed figures, though highly interesting, have a sameness which the uninitiated eye can soon get tired of. The poetry of Assyrian art is well illustrated by the excitement which arose when the bronze gate of Shalmaneser II. was discovered, a relic which, if we had even many artistic remains of Assyrian power of Egypt, would be only of secondary value. The same thing happened in the case of the cuneiform historical records, which, when the language of Assyria began to be known, also in all directions; the long and tedious narratives of battle, and conquests in the official annals have not held interest beyond the bare facts they contain. Even the learned world grew tired of these long recitals, always cast in the same mould, though attention was still attracted by the light which the mythological tablets and the existence of new languages and dialects, revealed by the bilingual texts, threw on Old Testament history; the general public soon left these questions to philologists, and they unfortunately confined the number to too narrow an area, especially on the Continent, where Assyriologists wasted their energy and knowledge in puerile rabbinical analysis of the Babylonian Syllabaries.

Among the literary treasures brought to light, however, there is a class too much neglected, but which seems to be now attracting more attention from Assyrian scholars—namely, the small tablets of a private character, of which a great variety is extant. Though few are as yet published or translated, nevertheless there is enough to them to show what a mine of interesting information these tablets contain concerning the manners and customs of the people in private intercourse, in those early times. These documents have generally been considered as having only a chronological value, the Babylonian contracts, from the time of the Assyrian conquest, being dated by the year of the reigning king. But now that the chronological list of the time has been discovered, we have more accurate dates, so that these tablets remain only to show that, in spite of political changes, commercial activity never abated in Babylon. We have contracts of every year, without interruption, from the Nabonidite period down to the Greek conquest. But the chief value of these contracts, no doubt, lies in the information they give us to the manners and customs of the Babylonians, revealing to us, so to speak, the Babylonians at home.

The oldest documents of the kind hitherto discovered carry us back to the reign of Hammurabi, who ruled in Babylon from 2130 to 2075 B. C. A peculiar feature is, that they give not only the year of the reign, but name the year; thus a date is fixed by the mention of some important event, such as the building of a temple, the capture of a city, or the like. These events give to these documents no little historical value on account of the events recorded. Their contents are much the same as those of the contracts of the later Babylonian Empire. It is indeed interesting to see the precaution at his early period selling and buying houses, fields, cows, slaves etc., by formal deed of gift from a priest in the temple, or the record of a judicial decision. The recurring difference between a formal contract of the [illegible] though in some cases [illegible] seems also carried on with more solemnity, as we see by a tablet recording a contract of partnership between two Babylonians. Each partnership was called "exchanging one brotherhood," just as to take a wife is to take one "into the house." In the latter the contracting parties, was a very [illegible] of the parties, decided that Akabiel had [illegible] at all to the property, and that upon clearing the mortgage on the house by paying two and a half mana to the mortgagee, Barsiptum should take possession of the property. These details, nevertheless, that refer to the arrangement in the deed of gift made by her husband, she must settle on Napiri her daughter, besides the three and a half mana, the amount of Bunanitum's dowry, her own property, as the slave, the whole of which, however, she was to retain possession of until her death.

The history of Bunanitum raises the interesting question of the position of women in these ancient times. Much has been said about the high estimation in which women was held among the Babylonians, and many writers have even gone so far as to found some ethnological deductions on this fact. The numerous data given in the private tablets seem, however, to prove the rights and privileges of women among the Babylonians have been greatly exaggerated. They never had equal footing with men, as in our modern society. They could certainly trade and hold property, but never does a woman appear as witness in any contract. This in itself is sufficient to show that woman never had any social standing in Babylon. Indeed, the provisions made for them by their husbands as in the case of Bunanitum, are only precautions to secure them against abuses to which their inferior position exposed them, and even this seems only to have been done when the family of the woman was rich enough to provide her with a dowry. The object of these provisions is clearly shown by a tablet in which the husband says that his son is to provide food and clothing for his mother, and to take care of her as a loving son, under penalty of disinheritance. This delicate point was left to the judgment of the mother, who, if she thought her son undutiful, was empowered to have him disinherited. The practice of settling property on women seems to have been pretty general, and explains the fact that in many contracts it is stated that they were drawn up "in the house of the women so-and-so," the woman being as a rule the wife or mother of one of the contracting parties. Similar provision was sometimes made for unmarried women by their brothers. This is shown in the will of a Babylonian, who leaves to his sister the usufruct of a seed-shop, which she no doubt had kept for him in his lifetime.

The way in which a woman was treated depended very much on her rank. For instance, if a man had married a woman of fortune and wanted to repudiate her on the ground of infidelity, he had to return her dowry; but this was not so if he had taken a wife from the lower class. In a contract of marriage between a rich Babylonian and a women of the poorer class, it is stipulated that if she is unfaithful she must perish by the sword. The Babylonian custom to vest lauded property in woman, originated no doubt among the higher class, to provide widows against spoliation by their brothers-in-law and other relatives. It was very likely adopted by the trading class to protect their property in case of commercial failure, as we see it practiced in our own times.

When parents married their daughters they were careful to give in the contract the amount of their dowry, which remained always the sole private property of the wife, and could never be alienated; they also took every precaution against accidents. Thus, in one marriage contract it is stated that if the husband lost his liberty, the wife should go back to her father's house—that is that the marriage should be dissolved.

It appears to have been far from rare for a man to lose his liberty on account of inability to pay his debts, as we know often happened in Rome. The Babylonians borrowed not only on their property but often also on their children, and even on themselves. If they were unable to pay back, their children and themselves became the property of the money-lender who can sell or keep them as slaves. Slave-trading was one of the most flourishing branches of commerce, as might be expected in a time when there was no substitute for manual labor. War gave to the kings the hands which built their huge monuments, but private individuals had to buy their slaves. When a girl was married she always received as dowry, besides a sum of money, one, or perhaps more slaves. As the domestic and agricultural slaves formed the bulk of the class, but the slave-breeder has many different articles in stock, and he spares neither money nor trouble to satisfy his customers. Slaves obtained in childhood or later from slaves were often trained by their masters in the various branches of industry, or else received lessons from teachers in the higher branches of education. These last were of course the most expensive, as they had to be trained at greater cost; some were to act as scribes, others to carve at one or to engrave gems. These details nevertheless, that refer to the arrangement in the deed of gift made by her husband, she must settle on Napiri her daughter, besides the three and a half mana, the amount of Bunanitum's dowry, her own property, as the slave, the whole of which, however, she was to retain possession of until her death.

THE RETURN OF THE JEWS.—Conclusion.

Other proofs, equally conclusive, abound in the writings of the prophets. To us it is simply amazing how some men will explain away, or even deny, the plainest passages, if they do not harmonize with some preconceived theory. Referring to Num. xiv. 21, where it is declared that "all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord," and to Heb. ii. 14, where it is affirmed that "the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea," I. C. Welcome says, "That such a state of glory and knowledge of the Lord can obtain in this world of mortality is impossible." He says the Lord has applied these beyond the judgment, by which beyond he means the new earth. He also refers to Isa. ii. 3, 4, which we will quote. "And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge between the nations, and shall reprove many peoples: and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." Now this passage, on the very face of it, so distinctly refers to a state of things this side the eternal state, that Mr. Welcome finds it more convenient, and more fully to suit his purpose, to deny it altogether, than to give a true exposition of it. Plainly as this passage points to the conversion of the Jews, and many of the people around, Mr. Welcome calls this a great delusion, and actually regards this sublime passage as a prediction of the delusion; not as a promise of such a state of things. He says there many people propose to be in union with the popular movements of the church.

So among those who deny the restoration of the Jews, some, if we refer them to certain passages which speak of their restoration, will tell us that they were fulfilled when the Jews returned from Babylon; and others, if we refer them to certain passages which speak of the wonderful blessings associated with their restoration, will tell us that they refer to the eternal state. If they are such blessings that they dare not say were enjoyed on their return from Babylonish captivity, they at once say that they belong to the state beyond the last judgment. Now let us see if there is any truth in this latter statement.

The end of Israel's sorrow, as recorded in Jer. xxxi. 2, will be in a state in which they will have the corn, the wine, the oil, and the young of the flock and the herd. Will it be said that these will be in the eternal state? When the prophecy recorded in Eze. xxxviii. 25–28, is fulfilled, that Israel shall dwell in the land, they, and their children, and their children's children, and shall be multiplied: and the tabernacle of God shall be with them, it is declared that the nations shall know that God is the Lord who doth sanctify Israel. Will it be said that nations will exist beyond this world of mortality?

When in chap. xxxix. 27–29, the Lord God declares that he will not hide his face from them any more, it is said in connection with his gathering them out of their enemies' land, and being sanctified in them in the sight of many nations. This is evidence that their enjoyment of God's favor and smile will be while nations still exist on the earth. Therefore, it cannot refer to the eternal state.

When in Isa. lx. it is said that the people of Israel shall all be righteous, it is not only in connection with their inheriting the land, but with their becoming a strong nation, and in a state in which day and night exist, and the fir tree, and the pine, and the boxtree exist, and men shall bring the wealth of the nations unto them. Surely this cannot refer to the eternal state.

When Jehovah declares that he will put his law in their inward parts, and will write it in their heart, and that from the least of them unto the greatest of them, they shall know the Lord. He also declares that they shall not cease from being a nation as long as the sun gives light by day, and the moon by night. Nothing like this, nothing approaching this, no state of things bearing any resemblance to this has ever yet existed among the nation of Israel. Those who oppose the view we advocate know that we now say is true. And there is undeniable evidence that this does not refer to the eternal world, after this mortal world has ended, for it is a state of righteousness that exists while day and night exist, and sun and moon and stars continue to give their light to this world. Then to what period does it refer? If it does not refer to the past, and does not refer to the eternal future, to what period does it refer? We answer, to the period which some deny, and some are frightened at, and others cry out against as heresy, namely, the thousand years, the Millennium, or the age to come, which comes between the present age, and the ages of eternity.

Again; Eze. xxxviii., seems to teach that after Israel are settled in their land, their enemies will invade it. But then, as we have seen, the Deliverer will overthrow their enemies. None that come against Jerusalem in that day shall escape the terrible judgments of God. "And it shall come to pass in that day that I will make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all the peoples: all that burden themselves with it shall be sore wounded." Zech. xii. 3. In that day the Lord will use converted Israel in scourging their enemies; they will bear the sword as appears from Psa. cxlix., and still "execute vengeance upon the nations, and punishments upon the people.

But the first gathering of Israel will be in unbelief, for it will not be till he comes, as we learn from Zech. xii. 10, "and they shall look unto him whom they have pierced," that they will call upon him for mercy. They will then accept their long rejected Messiah.

And after Israel's return, but before they are subdued and humbled, they will become very wealthy and will have abundance of silver, and gold, and also power and influence. These things will need to be taken from them before their redemption. Isa. ii. 7.

In Isa. lxv. 12–16, Jehovah makes a wide distinction between the nation of the Jews he will then be in the land in unbelief, and those who have his fear in their hearts and trust in him. The latter are frequently called "the remnant."

Much of the opposition of the Jewish nation to the Christ and his teachings might cease, if they only understood the teaching of the Christian Scriptures on the subject of the kingdom. If this teaching were properly unfolded and elucidated, they might see it to be in perfect accord with the teaching of their own prophets.

Again: after referring to the destruction of Jerusalem, and to the Jews being led away captive into all nations, Christ says, "And Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." The times of the Gentiles began when Jehoiakim, king of Judah, and the Jews were conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, and carried away into captivity; and therefore they embrace the long period in which the Jewish race has been dispersed, and ruled over and oppressed and persecuted by the Gentiles, and Jerusalem itself possessed by foreigners; and this passage plainly implies that when the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled, Jerusalem shall cease to be trodden down of the Gentiles. This treading down has already lasted eighteen hundred years; but the Savior's words make it clear that it shall cease; it shall only last till a given period, when the Gentile times are fulfilled, the treading down shall cease, and the scattered nation shall be restored to their own land. Palestine shall be again possessed, in peace and safety, by the ancient people.

In Matt. xxiii. 39, we read, "For I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Christ was just about leaving the temple for the last time when he uttered these words; it was near the memorable day of his crucifixion; many whom he was then addressing would probably not see him again, for after his resurrection he was not seen by the multitude, but simply by his disciples; yet he clearly intended that a time was coming when, as a people, they should see him again, and then they should welcome him and bless him. Other, referring to their return and repentance as foretold in prophecy, say very truthfully, "He who reads not this in the prophets, reads not yet the prophets aright."

The return of the children of Josiah and Israel is clearly implied in the notable phrase in Acts iii. 21: "the time of the restoration of all things." Those who believe the teaching of the Holy Ghost in this passage, are called restorationists, and people are warned against them as false teachers. Still, the restoration is there. Peter proclaimed it by divine inspiration; and the doctors of it, who are very many, have to read it out, or vote it out, or else explain it away. And this restoration is the same as that which we have seen in the prophetical writings; it is that "whereof God spake by the mouth of his holy prophets." And further, this restoration is conditioned on a change in their mind and conduct towards the Christ. This is the plain, grammatical meaning of the language. "Repent ye therefore, and turn again, that your sins may be blotted out, that so there may come seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord; and that he may send the Christ who hath been appointed for you even Jesus: whom the heaven must receive until the times of restoration of all things, whereof God spake by the mouth of his holy prophets which have been since the world began." Verses 19–21.

C. H. Spurgeon, in one of his sermons, says, "I think we do not attach sufficient importance to the restoration of the Jews. But certainly if there is any thing promised in the Bible, it is this. I imagine that you cannot read the Bible without seeing clearly that there is to be an actual restoration of the children of Israel. May that happy day soon come."

"Israel," says Gilfillan, "is a perpetual witness to the truth of the Premillennial Advent of Christ. She has, in all her wanderings, been upborne by two thoughts, which have never ceased to touch her weary heart with joy, and to lift up her depressed countenance with hope: the thought of the land of Palestine one day becoming hers, and the thought of a kingly and divine deliverer. With these thoughts the whole of her spiritual and natural life is involved, and, were they to forsake her, she would sink, like a spent wave, into the gulf of the nations."

Now it seems to us impossible to examine impartially all the foregoing evidence without arriving at the conviction that the dispersed nation will again be restored and settle in the land of their fathers.

Editor Restitution:

Thinking the friends of truth would be gratified to hear from the cause in Kansas, we write you a few lines. We left our wife and little ones on the morning of Feb. 3 and rode near 20 miles through the keen frosty air, to Bro. Weddell's. We found our friends all well and anxious for our arrival. A church of believers had been raised up at this point about fourteen years ago, by our esteemed Bro. Pickett, now in Oregon. As is usual, much strife and prejudice arose among the sects. Contention grew hot with time —many moved away, others grew cold in the cause once loved, and still others loving the truth but allowing the cares of this life to choke the word, becoming unfruitful. Real spirituality was at low tide. Yet, however, a few faithful ones clung to the wreck of the past, holding the beacon light above the wave of persecution which lashed on every side. Notwithstanding these untoward circumstances, trusting in the loving God and in the power of his word, we preached to them the words of this life, practically and pointedly, giving promiseses to present salvation, and pointing to our hope of the future salvation if we remain steadfast unto the end. God blessed his word. Backsliders were reclaimed, believers strengthened, the walls of prejudice crumbled beneath the strokes of the Word. Sinners were convinced, convicted and obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine delivered to us by the Holy Spirit through the apostles of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Ten were baptized into Christ, others wanted to be so, and will at some future meeting if all is well. Those satisfied with sprinkling have gotten buried with Christ. A number of others were fully convinced that we have the truth as revealed in the Word, and we fully believe will at some future time cast their lot and influence with us. Taking it all and in all, we had a most glorious meeting. The spirit of God resting upon and abiding with us. This was our first experience in carrying on a series of meetings. We expected Bro. Pettis to help us, but for some reason unknown to us, he did not come. We preached at out-study discourses in all. The people paid marked attention, and interest increased to the last, the house being full and listeners on the outside. The meeting should have been continued, but like so many of our brethren, our hands are tied. Spring advancing called us to the care of our loved ones at home. So on Monday, the 22, after reorganizing the little band of about twenty-five believers, with many tears, we bade them adieu. They elected elders and deacons, and clerk, and covenanted to meet weekly for prayer and praise. They also chose your unworthy servant to speak to them the Word of Life. They also remembered us temporarily. God bless this little vine of his own planting, water it with the word of truth, and at last gather us all with our jewels. Pray for us. Yours in hope,

R. F. PEARE.

THE ELEGY OF SHALLUM.

"Weep not for the dead, neither bemoan him: but weep sore for him that goeth away: for he shall return no more, nor see his native country."—Jer. xxii. 10.

Great indeed is the variety of style which we meet with in the Bible: it contains laws, history, biography, and moral precepts; it has prophecies of the future, songs of praise, and songs of lamentation; its poetry, indeed, is abundant, and sometimes we come across little bits of this class of writing, of much beauty, embedded in more prosaic and less captivating matter. The verse quoted above is just one of these little bits—an elegy, or lamentation, or funeral song, spoken by Jeremiah in anticipation of the fate of Judah's king.

Of this short lamentation, Dr. Samuel Cox (the reading of whose article on this subject has suggested the following thoughts), says:—"This exquisite little elegy, which was sung for many years in the City of Jerusalem, has a music and a pathos which even the least instructed and least thoughtful reader can hardly fail to recognize. Quite apart from their meaning, the mere words have a charm. They sound like a song. The very tone and rhythm of them might well move a sensitive heart to passive reflection. Musical in themselves, they readily ally themselves with music, and, indeed, there is one of Mendelssohn's songs 'Songs without Words' which they go as naturally as though it had these words in his mind when he wrote the song.'

There is, moreover, an interesting little story connected with this elegy, which it may be worth while to narrate.

The words themselves imply that there had been a previous weeping—"Weep not for the dead." Who was the "dead?" "But weep sore for him that goeth away." Who was he? The Prophet does not leave us long in doubt as regard the latter, for the next two verses (11 and 12) give the answer:—"For thus saith the Lord touching Shallum, the son of Josiah, king of Judah, which reigned instead of Josiah his father, which went forth out of this place; he shall not return thither any more: but in the place whither they have led him captive, there shall he die, and he shall see this land no more." Shallum reigned in place of his father Josiah, and we have therefore little difficulty in deciding that good king Josiah was the "dead," for whom the people were exhorted no longer to weep, neither to bemoan him. The history informs us that this was just what the people had been doing. "All Judah and Jerusalem mourned for Josiah. And Jeremiah lamented for Josiah: and all the singing-women spake of Josiah in their lamentations to this day, and made an ordinance in Israel: and, behold, they are written in the lamentations." 2 Chron. xxxv. 24, 25. "The breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the Lord, was taken in their pits, of whom we said—Under his shadow we shall live among the nations." Lam. iv. 20. These words are fully applicable to the sincerity of Josiah's reign, and to the esteem in which he was held for his personal character.

Now, our elegy has to do with the events immediately succeeding Josiah's death, and glancing at 1 Chronicles iii. 15, we learn that Josiah had four sons—"the first-born, Johanan; the second, Jehoiakim; the third, Zedekiah; the fourth Shallum." There is no doubt here as to the eldest—Johanan—who is supposed to have died before his father. Otherwise the order makes Shallum the youngest, and yet he was the first to succeed his father on the throne. This seems strange, and requires examination. The reader who takes the trouble to compare 2 Kings xxiii. 31, with verses 34 and 36, and chapter xxiv. 18, will find the following facts:—That Eliakim, or Jehoiakim, was certainly the eldest surviving son; that Jehoahaz, or Shallum, was next; and that Zedekiah was the youngest. How came Shallum to precede his elder brother on the throne? Let us consider this question.

Josiah had a long reign of 31 years. When he came to the throne he found the people of his kingdom sunk in idolatry, led and encouraged therein by his predecessors in the government. The nation was weakened, and because of their love for the gods and idolatries of their neighboring nations, God had given them up to decay; they were tributaries to Assyria or Egypt in turn; sometimes relying upon the one power, and sometimes upon the other, according as the ruling counsels of the nation thought it most judicious for their own safety to act. We generally find that the majority of the people were ever ready to follow the wickedness of their kings and rulers. But, at the same time, the Scriptures always speak of a "remnant" in Israel, in whom the Lord had hope—a faithful few who had not forsaken the true God, although they might be powerless to influence the counsels of the nation, owing to the overwhelming odds against them. Elijah, for example, was reminded and rebuked on this point, on that occasion when he lamented the wickedness of Israel under Ahab, of whom it is said:—"There was none like unto Ahab, who did sell himself to work wickedness in the sight of the Lord, whom Jezebel his wife stirred up." Looking around upon the gross corruption of the people, and the overwhelming odds he had to contend against, Elijah was prompted to exclaim: "I have been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts; for the children of Israel have forsaken Thy covenant, thrown down Thine altars, and slain Thy prophets with the sword: and I, even I only, am left, and they seek my life to take it away." How low Elijah had imagined the condition of the people, when he, the last worshipper of Jehovah, was also the prey of the assassin! "Yet I have left Me," replied Jehovah, "7000 in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him."

Such was the state of Judah when Josiah became king, and he at once set himself to reform the people, and purge them of their idolatries. The faithful remnant, there can be no doubt, would gather round him to strengthen his hands, and, above all, God returned to show him favor in his work, so that prosperity soon began to flow back to the nation; the foreign alliances were cast off for the arm of the Lord was strong and sufficient to preserve them. There is nothing like prosperity in a nation for attaching the people to their government. Josiah, therefore, was greatly beloved by his people, because of the good he had done them. But his reign was suddenly cut short by an act of folly on his own part. During his reign, or towards its close, the Assyrian empire was weak, and the Egyptian was strong. So the Scripture narrative informs us that Pharaoh-necheh made an expedition against the king of Assyria, and Josiah, whose kingdom lay between the contending armies, unadvisedly what can be attributed him. Necheh tried to persuade him to desist, saying his quarrel was not with him, but with Assyria; but Josiah would not listen, and as a result fell a victim, at Megiddo, to the arrow of one of Egypt's archers. His army was thus discomfited, and he himself carried back dead to Jerusalem to a mourning people, whose feelings are reflected in Jeremiah's words:—"The breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the Lord, was taken in their pits, of whom we said—Under his shadow we shall live among the nations."

Very shortly after Josiah's death a new element of lamentation is introduced:—"Weep ye not for the dead; but weep ye sore for him that goeth away." What strange and melancholy fate is this that awaits Josiah's son? and what are the circumstances attending it which should give it this peculiar melancholy interest for the people? Why should Shallum's fate be more sorely wept than that of Josiah?

Shallum's history, as recorded in 2 Kings xxiii. 31–35, is brief and tragic. He reigned but three months when Pharaoh-necheh, king of Egypt, deposed him, put his elder brother, Jehoiakim, on the throne in his stead; and putting Shallum in bands carried him away to Egypt, where he died. But this history only partly answers our inquiry; it gives us Shallum's fate, but does not explain why the people were called upon to weep for him sorely. We must, therefore, investigate a little deeper the circumstances of the time.

How did it come about that Shallum, a younger son, was the one raised to the throne? The fact indicates some abnormal condition of the nation; and it would appear that so soon as Josiah was dead, and especially owing to the circumstances of his death, when Pharaoh-necheh was again menacing the kingdom, the old factions sprung up. There were those who advocated foreign alliances (referred to by the Prophet Zephaniah—i. 5–8—who lived at this time) and there would be, as before, the "remnant" who were for adhering to Jehovah. Dr. Cox summarizes the state of matters thus:—"From the time of Solomon downward the Hebrew State was divided into two great political parties, one of which stood faithful to Jehovah and looked to Him for succor, while the other fell away to the service of heathen gods and sought to ally themselves now with Assyria, and now with Egypt. On the whole the pagan party prevailed. More than once, indeed, the downward course of the Hebrew Commonwealth was arrested, as, for example, by the reforms of Hezekiah and Josiah; but these feeble barriers were soon swept away by the swelling tide of the idolatrous vices and corruptions. During the long reign of Manasseh, the grandfather of Josiah, the very temple itself was desecrated with the statues, altars, and licentious rites, of heathen gods; foreign alliances were courted, foreign exactions submitted to; and in the very streets of Jerusalem the leading statesmen of Judah might be seen clothed—some in the Assyrian, and some in the Egyptian garb—ostentatiously parading, by their foreign apparel, their leanings to this alliance or to that."

The truth as regards Shallum would appear to be that he was chosen by the national party—the party who followed Josiah's counsels—as their leader; whilst Eliakim, his elder brother, was in favor of that party who advocated alliance with, and submission to the foreign power. But while the memory of Josiah was fresh in the minds of the people, and of all the prosperity he had brought to them, the national party prevailed, and put the younger son upon the throne. After Pharaoh-necheh had finished his expedition to the north, he by some means enticed Shallum to visit him at his camp at Riblah. The king of Egypt, knowing Shallum's antipathy to himself as the leader of the Jewish patriots, resolved that he should not reign in Jerusalem, so he, treacherously seized him, put him in bands, and carried him away into Egypt. Pharaoh found a ready and subservient tool in Eliakim, whom he made king in Jerusalem, and put the people under tribute to himself.

Thus Shallum, after a brief reign of three months, was suddenly carried away captive from his native land, and thrown into the dismal dungeons of Egypt, where he died. There is enough in his fate to awaken the pathetic elegy which Jeremiah sung for him. The Jews have frequently shown themselves strong in the feelings of patriotism, and they could not but lament the sudden, cutting off of a promising career, and the taking away into a foreign land of the hope of the nation. "Weep ye sore for him that goeth away; for he shall return no more, nor see his native country." These are the words of tender and affectionate remembrance, and they strike a responsive chord in our own hearts.

Was there no more than the personal fate of Shallum involved in Jeremiah's lamentation for him? Was it his personal character that called forth such remembrance? No; for Josiah had most unworthy sons. Shallum, Jehoiakim, and Zedekiah were all workers of evil. Shallum, however, was the last hope of the patriotic party—the party who resisted leaning upon the broken reeds of Egypt's and Assyria's power. This was why Shallum's fate was worthy of such "sore" weeping. From that time wickedness increased rapidly, until all God's threatened judgments were poured out on the land and people. I cannot do better than again use the words of Dr. Cox:—"From that time onward" (the time of Eliakim's placement on the throne), "till the sacred land was swept clean from its sinful inhabitants, cloud darkened on cloud, until the final storm—the doom-storm—came, and the winds blew, and the floods arose and the house of Israel, which seemed to be founded upon a rock, fell with a crash that reverberates in our hearts to this day."

This is the brief story connected with the Elegy of Shallum, and what is its lesson for us Gentiles? The apostle Paul has drawn one for us (Rom. xi. 20–22):—"Well; because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by faith. Be not high-minded, but fear. For if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he also spare not thee. Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness: otherwise thou also shalt be cut off." And as indicating the Divine readiness for a reconciliation with sinners, I may just quote Paul's pregnant words in the next verse (23):—"And they (Israel) also, if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able to graff them in again."—R. K. Strang, in Messenger.

We have a number of articles on hand which we intend to re-read with care. We must give variety in our columns. All an Editor can do is to make up periodically the very best paper he can for his readers out of all the materials he may have at hand. This we try scrupulously and conscientiously to do—with what success we must leave our readers to judge.

We have important articles for future numbers on hand, both original from our contributors, and selected from other sources. J. Cameron furnishes one of a truly able and critical character on the Gospel of the Kingdom, and Silas Henn one on the Millennium. "The True Character of the Present Dispensation," is selected, and we regret that its length will compel us to divide it for two successive issues of our paper. New readers of THE RESTITUTION can not afford to discontinue its weekly visits for awhile yet. On many vital subjects, the leading denominations greatly misapprehend the teachings of inspiration, and, consequently, make strange misapplications of what belongs to one people, in one dispensation, to a very different people of an entirely different dispensation.

THE Bible Banner now comes to us from Chicago, Ill., instead of Philadelphia, Penn. It is one of our excellent exchanges although not advocating the strictly Millennarian views maintained in the columns of THE RESTITUTION. While liking many things in the different American Advent Journals, we are far more nearly in accord with English Periodicals as to the literal fulfilment of prophesy regarding the future restoration of Judah and Israel to the land of their fathers, as well as regards other predictions relative to the rule of Christ and his chosen over the left of the nations in the coming age. As to the correctness of the literal interpretation, we fearlessly and confidently await the developments of history.

THE DEATH STATE.

Then said Jesus unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead. John xi. 14.

Our Lord, in his preceding remarks, had used the expression that is so often employed when speaking of the state of the holy dead, viz: sleep. "Our friend Lazarus is fallen asleep; but I go that I may awake him out of sleep. The disciples therefore said unto him, Lord, if he is fallen asleep he will recover. Now Jesus had spoken of his death; but they thought that he had spoken of taking rest in sleep. Then Jesus, therefore, said unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead." John xi. 11–15. R. V.

This sickness and death occurred to show forth God's glory, and to demonstrate the ability of Jesus, as the Son of God from heaven, to effect the grandest work connected with our redemption—the resurrection of the dead.

He had already taught his disciples and the Jewish people that he was the Son of God in language the most unmistakable, because the most precise and definite. He says: "My Father worketh even until now, and I work. For this cause therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only brake the Sabbath, but also called God his own Father, making himself equal with God." He next shows that, in consequence of this divine relationship, he has the power to do greater works than those that they had seen him perform, even to raise the dead. "For as the Father raiseth the dead and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom he will. Verily, verily I say unto you, The hour cometh, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live. For as the Father hath life in himself, even so gave he to the Son to have life in himself." John v. 17, 18, 21, 25, 26.—R. V.

In another interview he touches still plainer, concerning this life which, as Son, he inherits from his Heavenly Father, as well as concerning the secured resurrection of all given unto him by his Father. "For I am come down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me, that of all that which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day. For this is the will of my Father, that every one that beholdeth the Son, and believeth on him, should have eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day." John vi. 38, 40.

In the death of Lazarus, then, there had come the opportunity, not only to show forth the glory of his Heavenly Father, but, also, to demonstrate his own power, as God's own proper Son, by raising up and giving life to one dead. Accordingly he repairs to Bethany to find that Lazarus was not only dead, but that he had been entombed four days. While the sisters were well assured that their brother would not have died if Jesus had only been present to have removed the disease, they, at the same time, seem to have had the faith, in some degree, that even death itself might not interpose an insuperable obstacle to the re-living of the loved and lost sleeper in the grave. Martha says: "And even now I know that whatsoever thou shalt ask God, God will give thee. Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall rise again. Martha said unto him, I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day. Jesus saith unto her, I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on me though he die, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die. Believest thou this? She saith unto him, Yea Lord; I believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, even he that cometh into the world."

Martha's faith, then, was, that the expected Messiah, that should come into the world, would be the Son of God, and, consequently, would be able even to raise the dead; and, furthermore, that Jesus Christ himself was both God's Messiah, as well as God's own Son. To justify this faith, glorify his Heavenly Father, and prove his legitimate Sonship, it remained now for Jesus to demonstrate this relationship to God, and confirm his own statements about "quickening and raising the dead" to now give life to the dead Lazarus. He could prove his ability to raise a multitude of dead ones "at the last day"—or in "the hour that cometh," by raising up and giving life to the one in the tomb in "the hour that now is." Accordingly he asks—"Where have ye laid him? They say unto him, Lord, come and see. Jesus wept. The Jews therefore said, Behold how he loved him! But some of them said, Could not this man, which opened the eyes of him that was blind, have caused that this man also should not die?"

Even the Jews themselves concluded that the one that could give sight to one born blind could have arrested the fatal disease, but that Jesus had come into the world to do more than save the present life for a time, even to give an endless life to the dead, was more than entered into their faithless minds. Jesus had promised that they should see greater works than healing diseases, and the hour for the display of his power and for them to see the glory of God had now come. "Jesus therefore groaning in himself cometh to the tomb. Now it was a cave, and a stone lay against it. Jesus saith, Take ye away the stone. Martha, the sister of him that was dead, saith unto him, Lord, by this time he stinketh; for he hath been dead four days. Jesus said unto her, Said I not unto thee, that, if thou believest, thou shouldest see the glory of God? So they took away the stone."

Now comes the supreme moment. The agonizing sisters have avowed their faith in Jesus as the Son of God—a claim for making which the Jews had sought to kill him as one guilty of unpardonable blasphemy. And to make the moment more intensely interesting and exciting, a multitude of these faithless Jews were standing around that solemn tomb. The dismal door to the pit of corruption stood open. One claiming Celestial parentage was the chief figure in the foreground. No picture ever thrown on the broad canvas of time was ever limned in more vividly contrasting colorings of lights and shadings. Bright Heaven, dim Earth, and dismal Hades are all in proximate display. The Universe looks on, and the destiny of ages hangs on the finishing strokes of the divine pencil. Let us see the painting as the inspired artist gives the completing delineations. "And Jesus lifted up his eyes, and said, Father, I thank thee that thou heardest me. And I knew that thou hearest me always; but because of the multitude which standeth around I said it, that they may believe that thou didst send me. And when he had thus spoken, he cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth. He that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave-clothes; and his face was bound about with a napkin. Jesus saith unto them, Loose him, and let him go."

Our picture is finished; and no object lesson ever presented such visible illustration of the still grander events prefigured. The resurrection of the one is the proof of ability to raise the millions. In the Son of God the world has a Savior who can redeem from death. A practical answer, in the affirmative, has been given to the question of ages—"If a man die shall he live again?" God's own Son has come into the world, and he can redeem from death.

This One, whom God has sent into the world, holds the keys of death and Hades in his hands. For four thousand years the king of terrors had swayed his ebon sceptre over a hopeless world. Knocking alike at the door of the palace and the entrance to the hovel, he had borne prince and pauper alike to the pit of destruction. Whether it were the rough box that went out from the miserable hut, or the costly casket that went out from royal halls, it was one dead that was borne away to alike hopelessly consume away in the land of silences, darkness, and forgetfulness.

But Christ has taken the keys from the relentless tyrant, and eventually will both disarm and destroy the fell destroyer himself. The stone that was rolled from that cave opened the way into still deeper and darker chambers, where the countless multitudes sleep the same unbroken death-sleep; and the released brother, coming through the unlocked door, came as the Avant-courier—the forerunner—of the unnumbered millions who are awaiting the voice of the Son of God at the last day.

At this time we venture no answer to the following question proposed by the poet. Others may ask—Was the personality of the loved sleeper consciously existent in heaven? If not, was it existent in Paradise? Of this possibly hereafter. It will be seen that the poet ventures no answer himself to a question of irrepressible interest in these days.

"When Lazarus left his charnel cave,
And home to Mary's house returned:
Was this demanded—If he yearned
To hear her wailing at his grave.

"Where wast thou, brother, those four days?
There lives no record of reply,
Which telling what it is to die
Had surely added fame to praise.

From every house the neighbors met,
The streets were filled with joyful sounds,
And solemn gladness even crowned
The purple brows of Olivet.

Behold a man raised up by Christ:
The rest remaineth unrevealed;
He told it not; or something sealed
The lips of the Evangelist."

—Tennyson.

"Greek—κατεφιλησεν εαυτον τον θεον—Said God was his own proper Father. In Rom viii. 32, we have the correlative expression in the same unequivocal form
—Ος γε τον ιδιου ουκ εφεισατο—Who spared not his own proper Son. This Greek word ιδιος means what is one's own specially, separately and exclusively; as—Working without our hands; 1 Cor. iv. 12;—Sinneth against his own body; 1 Cor. vi. 18;—Have her own husband; 1 Cor. vii. 2;—His own sins; Heb. vii. 27.—His own blood; Heb. ix. 12 and xiii. 12; —In his own name; Jno. v. 43.

There are a few specimens out of nearly one hundred in the New Testament showing the restrictive use of this adjective. That Isaac was Abraham's own proper son is not so absolutely stated in the Scriptures as it is that Jesus is God's own proper Son. More perhaps of this hereafter. For the present see a good article in this issue from Bro. Wiley Jones, on the Sonship.

"THE ACTS."

This book or treatise embraces the history of the Christian church for the space of about thirty years. In this short compass of thirty-one pages is found a record of events and doctrine of surpassing interest and importance to all men. Here is the knowledge and wisdom which no man can afford to neglect except at the peril of his own well-being.

This book, though arranged by human hands, as to the place it occupies in the divine volume, is where it ought to be as respect to its date shows—between the biographies or memoirs of Jesus Christ by his four inspired penmen, and the letters to the churches, written by Paul, Peter, James, John and Jude. Touching its authorship I simply say: Luke wrote it. These thirty years of history date from the beginning of a new dispensation or age; preeminently the dispensation of the Spirit. Here is a record of the introduction and development of the new order of instruction and obedience. The old order of teaching and obedience required by the Law, is superceded. That was nailed to the cross. Col. ii. 14. Men are not now obliged, as formerly, to repair to Mount Zion to worship the true and living God, but any where the true worshipers could worship the Father in spirit, and in truth. John iv. 21.

Supernaturalism in both word and work, crowd these few pages; just as might be expected at a time when the old national religious, both Jewish and Pagan, were to fall before this new religion of the crucified and risen Nazarene.

The first chapter in its history antedates a few days that marvelous Pentecost, in which the Spirit was poured out upon the waiting apostles. How often my mind reverts to the words of this opening page. It is the last meeting of Jesus with his disciples, on the very eve of his ascension. His talk with them is short. He repeats the promise of the Father in reference to the Holy Ghost; commands them to wait at Jerusalem for its fulfillment, answers their anxious question touching the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, and closes by speaking of their testimony for him in the broad field of their labor on which they would enter in a few days. Then comes the sad parting scene. That Jesus with whom they had been associated for years in the most familiar intercourse, and had hung in rapturous awe and reverence on the words of his lips, is about to be separated from them. Could they believe it? Anxious as they are to retain his endearing presence he is taken up from them and a cloud receives him out of their sight, and they are left intently gazing up into heaven, spell bound with the fast and suddenness of his departure.

From that date the church has been walking by faith, based upon the sure promise of the two men in white apparel, who said: That same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven. Here is Adventism on the initial page of this historical book, and on the very threshold of the new dispensation. The promise of a coming Redeemer in the bow of hope spanning the two extremes of the church's vision. This cannot be a figurative coming, it must be real and personal, and remains to be fulfilled in the future.

On reading the second chapter, we notice that what transpires on the Pentecost mentioned in the first verse, would make any day or date illustrious. Right at this point of time, at the place designated by Jesus, the apostles did their very first work in obedience to the commission as recorded by Matthew, Mark and Luke: Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned.

Luke writes: Thus it is written and thus it behooved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day; and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name, among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. All who believe the Bible to be the Word of God must believe that the apostles were properly qualified by the Holy Spirit to teach what is embodied in the commission. Hence were able to teach truthfully the gospel and its cognate truths, facts and commands, including, of course, repentance, baptism and remission of sins and all other things which they were to teach their converts to observe, Matt. xxviii. 20, together with all the special promises and historical facts, making the sum total of the gospel.

Proposition 1. The Acts contains a history of the Apostles' preaching and of conversions to the Christian religion.

Prop. 2. That the question, What must I believe and do to be saved? is answered here in sufficiently plain language for every intelligent person to understand, if he but applies himself to the study of the Scriptures with something of the urgency which so important a question demands. I invite the uninstructed who wish to learn the way to become a Christian to read carefully the teachings of these spirit-endowed apostles, for I feel sure that if you do you cannot fail to settle the question satisfactorily. Many persons have told me that they were completely confused by this Babel of tongues, teaching as many different ways. Dear soul, listen to the Word. There is but one tongue here. Do not charge God with giving a revelation so obscure that you can not understand it. What shall we do? was the earnest, plain and pointed question put by Peter's auditors, on the day of Pentecost. The answer ought to be equally plain. God never trifles, as men sometimes do, even with the most solemn questions. Will Peter "hem and haw" as I have heard modern teachers, times and again do when I have put the question to them with a view to eliciting an answer, saying that God wants the heart. Baptism is an outward ordinance and therefore can not save. Sometimes they endeavor to turn this holy command into ridicule, when every thing bearing the semblance of argument fails them. What is Peter's answer, given under inspiration of the Holy Spirit. "Repent and be baptized every one of you in (epi—upon) the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit." These Jews had faith, hence it was not necessary for Peter to command them to believe. At that time the minds of men were not perplexed with the theological definitions and distinctions of the various kinds of faith. Nor did they raise the question as to how faith came. It did come with powerful force from hearing the Apostle's words, his gospel accompanied by the charge of murdering the Messiah whom God had raised from the dead, God's spirit bearing witness through the Apostles by their power to speak in all the languages of the nations from whence these worshiping Jews came. Their faith came most emphatically by hearing Rom. x. 17. Feeling was produced by this faith. In the light of the truth they felt that they were sinners, great sinners, and so felt the need of a remedy for sin. It was this sad state of mind which prompted the question: What shall we do? The question was most urgent. It was a matter in hand that must be attended to speedily. But says one, I am not as wicked as these Jews whom Peter charges with crucifying their Lord. But you are a sinner nevertheless and under condemnation; the wrath of God abiding on you; therefore you will not see life unless you repent. John iii. 36. You need the same remedy, must apply to the same great physician and follow his prescription. This may may appear very humiliating to you, my alien friend. But you need humbling. Self must be crucified. It must not set itself in opposition to any part of God's revealed will whether the matter be faith, repentance or baptism, or the "all things" of the after Christian life. There must be a full, unreserved surrender on your part. Obey, obey, is the command which meets you on the threshold of salvation. Had the language of Peter fallen on indifferent ears, on thoughtless and inconsiderate hearts, on minds prone to hurry away from the serious concerns of a future state to busy themselves with the thoughts and plans in the little compass of human affairs, then that message would have produced no contrition on account of sin and no deep feeling of the need of the Divine Savior, no cry of "what shall we do." While thousands gave heed to the message of the Heavenly-empowered witnesses other thousands no doubt more numerous, slighted and rejected the offers of mercy as the great majority of the race have been doing ever since. Who is to blame? God or man? Away with the thought that God is to blame for a supposed incapacity in the mind and will of man to grasp the truth and obey its requirements; or that his plan of redemption is unsuitable to accomplish the end for which it was designed.

Every where in God's word man is held responsible for his conduct from the moment the light of truth is thrown across his path. To plead ignorance will avail nothing, to urge the obscurity of revelation is daring presumption, sin and, to refuse to purchase a Bible would only aggravate the case.

"Remove not the Old Landmarks." Prov. xxii. 28.

This proverb is quoted from "the law of God," given to Israel; and through them to our race, Deut. xix. 14. Its violation by Israel was severely punished, Hos. v. 10. Hence it is written, cursed be he that removeth his neighbor's landmark, and let all say amen! Deut. xxvii. 17.

This righteous principle pervades Revelation, and applies especially to God's truth, which is ever guarded as by the cherubim, Gen. iii. 24; Deut. xviii. 20, 22; Rev. xxii. 18, 19.

On this line of righteous precept, and to confound "the adversary"—Adam did die—death has reigned over all living things, Rom. v. 12. The chosen nation has been "trodden down of the Gentiles, and dispersed to the four winds." Nay more "the departure from the faith" has become historic also, in our gospel age.—Declension and darkness prevail!

This human infirmity as to good, seems almost universal, "all flesh is as grass;" while only "the word of the Lord abideth for instruction in righteousness that the man of God may be perfect, . . . every good work." 2 Tim. iii. 9.

Let us apply this doctrine of the Lord.

1. The number of imperial Gentile powers is "four." This number four is given ten times in varied relations, Jer. xv. 3; Ezek. xiv. 21; Dan. ii. 40; vii. 3, 7, 17, 19, 23; Zech. i. 18, 22; and vi. 1! These texts are a ten-fold landmark, to the times of the Gentiles." To all God says—"Remove not this (dispensational) landmark. Amen."

2. This is doubly assured, (if need be, to those who have not seen it) by the oft repeated fact that Rome—"the fourth"—reaches the judgment!—the kingdom of God! Dan. ii. 30–45; vii. 7–10; Matt. xv. Rev. xvii. 20. It leaves no time or place for a fifth form of Gentile—anti-Christianism. No! No! No!

Note! The ten toes—ten horns—ten kings and the other that rose after them," were parts and appendages of Rome the last in the series of Gentile Empire!

3. The imagery, geography and history of this last Gentile empire, are all Roman! They centre in the seven hills of Rome! Its harlot church-symbol also asserts its unmistakable identification! Rev. xvii. to xix. The symbol is varied from that, Dan. vii. and yet to set forth its diversified enormities in apostasy and anti-Christian oppression and abomination! Its doom as majestic Babylon answers to that of Sodom!

The wonder is that any one should dream of a more infernal humanity, or infuriate "adversary, than the devil," 1 Pet. v. 8.

Let this suffice! One thing is certain, God's number four is not five! His ten fold landmark—to note the end of Gentile anti-Christianism, can not be moved! Amen. It is Divinely guarded, Deut. xxvii. 17.

4. "The king of the North" noted four times, Dan. xi. was Syria in Asia; but North to Judea. It did not reach or concern Russia, at all. Russia and American nationalities, are modern, and may be referred to in general as "the ends of the earth."

5. There is no fifth kingdom in prophecy for earth, till "The Son of Man; and Messiah, take the kingdom," Dan. vii. 14, 18, 27.

6. Rome—the fourth, conquered Greece, the third; the anti-Christian authority over Christ, his apostles and saints; and "the desolation," to Judea and Jerusalem, Dan. ix. 27; Matt. xxiv. Rev. xii. 20; and is itself to be hurled to its doom "as a great millstone cast into the sea!" No other nation takes its place or shares its destiny! This landmark is fixed and to faith fast as the throne!!

7. But the untaught read "the king of the North," and they insert Russia! Others read of "the West," and they think of our United States—but both classes are alike oblivious to the geography, chronology, and history; as "noted in the Scriptures of truth," they over ride God's "landmark!"

Well, what of these modern "nations?" They may be taken for the scions—offshoots of the old Gentile "tree," Isa. x. 33, 34; and in contrast with, "The root of Jesse—an ensign of the people," Isa. xi. 1–10. Our Bible is a big book!! Amen.

These outlying "nations" may be embraced. Dan. xii. 14;—before Christ. Matt. xxv. 31; and that "Satan shall no more deceive" through the 1000 years. Rev. xx. 3.

Our world has a grand and glorious future! Jerusalem to be rebuilt will need its Gentile builders. Isa. lx. 10, 12.

This is for testimony. It simplifies prophecy, dissipates mystery; and gives to God the glory of his truth and grace. Amen.

Reverently to God; Lovingly to all.

"God Knows."

O, what a world of consolation in these two words. "God knows." When we consider the blessing and privilege of becoming the children of God, and that he is kinder and more willing to do for us, than any earthly parent can, that in all our troubles and trials, (many of which the world knows nothing of) we can go to him in the name of our dear Savior, and childlike, acknowledge all our waywardness and short comings, and ask him to forgive us, he will in no wise turn us away. Yes, "God knows." He knows all our weakness, he knows just how much we try to obey and please him. He knows how much we can bear of temptation, and knows how to succor us when we are tempted. He also knows our sincerity whether our works are for a show to the world, or for the love of the truth. In short he knows the very intents of our hearts. Oh! how careful we should be in all we say and do. Let us so live that we may be accounted worthy to enter into that rest that remaineth for the people of God. Let us be honest to ourselves, and to our Creator. "God knows."

A Skeptic's Opinion of Christ.

"It is no use to say that Christ, as exhibited in the Gospels, is not historical, and that we know not how much of what is admirable is superadded by the tradition of the followers. Who among his disciples or among their proselytes was capable of inventing the sayings ascribed to Jesus, or of imagining the life and character revealed in the Gospel? Certainly not the fishermen of Galilee; as certainly not St. Paul, whose character and idiosyncrasies were of a totally different sort, still less the early Christian writers, in whom nothing is more evident than that the good which was in them was all derived from the higher source.

"About the life and sayings of Jesus there is a stamp of personal originality combined with profundity of insight, which, if we abandoned the idle expectation of finding scientific precision where something very different was aimed at, must place the Prophet of Nazareth, even in the estimation of those who have no belief in his inspiration, in the very first rank of the men of sublime genius of whom our species can boast. When this preeminent genius is combined with the qualities of probably the greatest moral reformer and martyr to that mission who ever existed upon earth, religion cannot be said to have made a bad choice in pitching on this man as the ideal representative and guide of humanity; nor even now would it be easy, even for an unbeliever, to find a better translation of the rule of virtue from the abstract into the concrete than to endeavor so to live that Christ would approve our life.—John Stuart Mill, Three Essays on Religion.

"JESUS NAZARENUS REX JUDEORUM."

[The following is the last poem written by Mr. Jarvis, and unpublished at the time of his death.]

In the gray twilight of a dreary morn,
A prisoner stood, defenseless and forlorn
While, to a Roman judge, with boisterous breath,
His fierce accusers clamored for His death.

It was the Christ, rejected and abused;
The King of kings, His sovereign claim refused;
The Son of God, abandoned and betrayed,
An Outcast, in the world which He had made.

It was His chosen people whose demand
That timid judge was powerless to withstand;
And, while their lips reviled the charges he denied,
He gave their victim to be crucified.

His chosen people! There he stood aloof;
Where He died, a thief died to His breast;
Who cried more loudly, as unmoved He stood,
"On us, and on our children, be His blood!"

O, Holy Savior! May Thy grace reverse
The dreadful import of that reckless curse:
And, on the Israelites, Thy atonement prove
"The Blood of Sprinkling," through Redeeming Love!

THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

In THE RESTITUTION of Feb. 3rd, an article appears in answer to the question, "Was there any real kingdom of God to which it was possible in the circumstances that Jesus alluded when he came preaching the kingdom of God?" As the answer given, in my opinion, does not meet the question satisfactorily, I offer the following remarks upon it. First it is necessary to have the facts of the case before our minds when we seek a satisfactory judgment. We have first in order the sender of the message. This was Jehovah the King and declared savior of Israel. Second, we have the messenger, the Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God and king of Israel, raised up to them by Jehovah their king. Third, we have the tribes of Judah, Benjamin and Levi, and portions of the others, governed by rulers under the power of Rome, but with the exercise of Jehovah's laws as expounded by the priesthood of the house of Levi.

The territory of Palestine, divided by the Romans into four parts, was the territory proper of the kingdom of God. The portions of the twelve tribes of Israel then living in these Roman provinces together with the other tribes in dispersion were the subjects of God's kingdom. And the priesthood performed the functions of provincial rulers. They had possession of the kingdom and ruled over it in subjection to the will of Rome.

It was in these circumstances that Jehovah the king of Israel who had subjugated them to Rome for their rebellion against him, prepared and then sent two messengers to them, the one six months before the other. The message sent by John the Baptist is thus given by Matthew, "And in those days cometh John the Baptist proclaiming in the wilderness of Judea, and saying, Reform ye, for the reign of the heavens hath come, for this is he who was spoken of by Isaiah the prophet, saying, A voice of one crying in the wilderness, prepare ye the way of the Lord (Jehovah), straight make ye his paths." John further says of himself, I indeed baptize you unto repentance for reformation, but he who is coming after me is mightier than I, whose sandals I am not worthy to bear; he shall baptize you in the Holy Spirit and in fire; whose fan is in his hand and he will thoroughly cleanse his floor and will gather his wheat into the store house, but the chaff he will burn with unquenchable fire.

The proclamation sent by Jesus from Jehovah was the same as that sent by John as Matthew records. And from the time John was cast into prison Jesus began to proclaim and to say, Reform for the reign of the heavens hath come. Matt. iv. 17.

From these two proclamations it is manifest that whatever the meaning of the phrase "the kingdom of heaven" or "the reign of the heavens" may be, that thing or being was present when the proclamation was made. The after developments of the kingdom ought not to be confounded with its beginnings.

When we turn to Mark's account we find him calling it "the beginning of the good news of Jesus Christ the Son of God." As it hath been written in the prophets, Lo I send my messenger before thy face who shall prepare thy way before thee—a voice of one crying in the wilderness, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord (Jehovah), make straight ye his paths." Mark i. 1-3. And after the delivering up of John, Jesus came to Galilee proclaiming the good news of the reign of God, and saying, "Fulfilled hath been the time and the reign of God hath come near; reform ye and believe the good news." Mark i. 14, 15.

There are three things stated by Mark in these passages quoted which cannot have a future meaning. First, he fixes the beginning of the good news of Jesus Christ the Son of God, by quoting the proclamation of John the Baptist. Second, Jesus affirms the time is fulfilled. Third, and after affirming the kingdom of God has come near, he commands his hearers to repent and believe the good news.

Now the good news he preached is summed up into items, viz, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God or the reign of God has come near. These expressions preclude the idea of futurity, and fix the duty of every hearer of John and Jesus down to a good news to themselves which they were to believe and obey for their salvation.

In the meantime we pass over the good news which the angel Gabriel bare to Mary before Jesus was conceived, and also the good news of the heavenly host who came to the shepherds while tending their flocks. These cannot be construed into future events however much they have to do with every after event.

In the third chapter of Luke's narrative, we have a most circumstantial account of the word of God having come to John, the son of Zacharias, in the wilderness. He says, "And he came into all the country round about Jordan, preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins. As it is written in the book of the words of Esaias the prophet, saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord (Jehovah), make his paths straight. Every valley shall be filled and every mountain and hill shall be made low, and the crooked shall be made straight and the rough ways shall be made smooth. And all flesh shall see the salvation of God."

No one questions that the immediate result to every one who repented and was baptized by John was the remission of all his past sins. Second, the result of his mission was a preparation of Jehovah's way by which all flesh would be able to see his, that is Jehovah's, salvation. In other words, Jehovah's word proclaimed by John had practical ends to be served, and these ends were accomplished to the letter without failure.

And as the people mused in their hearts of John, whether he were the Christ or not, he answered, saying unto them all, "I indeed baptize you in water, but one mightier than I cometh, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose, he shall baptize you with the Holy Spirit and with fire; whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and will gather the wheat into his garner, but the chaff he will burn up with unquenchable fire."

In this statement John affirms the one mightier than he was to do five things:

1. He is to baptize in Holy Spirit.
2. He is to baptize in fire.
3. He is to cleanse his floor.
4. He is to gather his wheat into his garner.
5. He is to burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire.

If, therefore, these or any of these powers were possessed and made use of by Jesus, the possession and use demonstrate their real presence at that time.

In Luke iv. 18, Jesus read from the prophesy of Isaiah "The spirit of the Lord (Jehovah) is upon me because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor. He hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, and to preach deliverance to the captives, and the recovery of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised; to preach the acceptable year of the Lord (Jehovah). And after he shut the book and gave it again to the servant he began to say unto them, This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears."

There are seven different things affirmed here, and of these Jesus says they were that day fulfilled in the hearing of those in the synagogue. If therefore, the works performed by Jesus before he was crucified be admitted to be the works of God, then the demonstration was given of a real thing, called by him the Kingdom of God, had come to Judea at that time.

When Jesus said to the man sick of the palsey, "Man thy sins be forgiven thee," the Scribes and Pharisees began to reason saying, "Who is this that speaketh blasphemies? Who can forgive sins but God alone? Jesus perceiving their thoughts, said unto them, What reason ye in your hearts? whether is easier to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Rise up and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of Man hath power upon earth to forgive sins (he said unto the sick of the palsey) I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy couch, and go into thine house."

This is a most important statement, as it illustrates the possession of the power to forgive and to heal, by Jesus, who calls himself the Son of Man. The man did as Jesus commanded and departed to his own house, glorifying God. "And they were all amazed and they glorified God, and were filled with fear, saying, We have seen strange things today."

The raising up from the dead state the widow of Nain's son, produced fear upon all who witnessed it, and they glorified God, saying, that a great prophet is risen up among us; and that God hath visited his people.

When accused of casting out demons by the power of Beelzebub, he said, Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation, and every house divided against itself falleth. If Satan also be divided against himself how shall his kingdom stand? But if I by the finger of God cast out demons, no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you. The illustration of the strong man being overcome by the stronger than he, simply repeats in another form the fact that God's kingdom was then present in visible power, and as real in kind as it ever was in the past, or ever will be at any future time.

The presence of disease and death are in themselves the evidences of God's power and willingness to inflict punishment upon the rebellious; and his presence at the same time to remove disease and death shows most conclusively that his disposition to retain men free from disease and death is by far stronger than the disposition to inflict them. The presence of disease has been accounted for by men as due to a variety of causes, real or supposed. It is manifest that to account for it or to trace it to any other cause than the disobedience of man on the one hand, and the pleasure of God to inflict pain upon the disobedient for his good or for the good of mankind on the other, is a mistake. The infliction of corrective punishment cannot remove the remedy before a cure is effected or the patient proved incurable.

It is the failure to perceive that the time under consideration was the end of a long series of corrective punishment measures employed by Jehovah upon Israel to gather them as a hen gathers her brood under her wings, that prevents men from perceiving that the presence of the Lord Jesus Christ the Son of God, in the midst of Israel, was at the same time the presence of Jehovah the God and Father of the Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ, for God himself affirmed that Jesus was the begotten Son, and Jesus affirmed that God was in him, and that whoever had seen him had seen the Father. I repeat that it was the failure to perceive that God visited Israel in the person of his Son to complete and perfect the means for reconciling the world unto himself, that prevents men from seeing that the powers possessed and manifested were the powers of God's kingdom given to Jesus as the ground of confidence, not that he at some future day shall have all power in heaven and upon earth, but that he has it already.

It has been assumed that the subjects of the kingdom, the twelve tribes of Israel, were and are the kingdom of God. This is a mistake. The real essential element of the kingdom of God as it existed from Moses till John the Baptist, was the absolute sovereignty of Jehovah over them. This element cannot be altered nor amended. It was in virtue of this element that God overthrew the throne of his vassal Zedekiah. It was in virtue of his absolute sovereignty that he sent his angel to Mary the mother of Jesus, and told her that the Lord God would give to her child the throne of his father David. David was Jehovah's vassal, and from necessity a temporary one. The angel's statement shows that Jesus shall be Jehovah's vassal. The evidence that Jesus was the Son of God, and the Christ of God, forms the evidence that the kingdom of God or the reign of God was present, and received by every one who received Jesus, and rejected by every one who rejected him. Jesus' claims to the throne of Israel rest upon the fact that he was begotten of the Spirit of God, which is simply another way of saying he was begotten of God. His right of inheritance was derived from Spirit, not from flesh. Nicodemus did not see this before he visited Jesus. He saw, as many do today, a worker of wonders. If he had believed the testimony of John the Baptist he would have seen the kingdom of God and if he had believed the testimony of God when Jesus was baptized, he would have seen the Son of God and King of Israel.

Israel rejected, excepting the remnant, their King, and in rejecting him they rejected the kingdom, as no one can either inherit the kingdom, that is the authority to rule or be a subject of the kingdom who does not, in the first place hear the voice of Jehovah the Sovereign first, and submit himself to Jehovah's Christ. Persons may reject both and be subjects in rebellion or disobedience, but unless these repent they lose the favor of being heirs or subjects with their natural life.

I affirm, therefore, that what Jesus preached as the kingdom of God was present when he preached it.

ארני יהוה כחזק יבוא

These words occur in Isa. xl. 10, and are rendered in the Common Version, "The Lord GOD will come with a strong hand," the last word being italicised to show that it is not in the original. The Revised Version renders them, "The Lord God will come as a mighty one." Dr. J. Thomas, applying the prophesy to Christ, renders the words, Adonai YAHWEH will come in might. (Eureka, vol. i. p. 135. But while the preposition ב may very fitly here have its primary and literal signification, "in," the word חזק, chazak, is an adjective, masculine gender, and so denotes, as rendered by the revisers, "a mighty one." To follow closely the order and idiom of the original, I think the prophesy should be rendered, "The Lord JEHOVAH in a mighty One will come."

If all the Jews had "searched the Scriptures" (Jno. v. 39), and believed the Messianic prophecies, as many of the Bereans did (Acts xvii. 11, 12), they would not have sought to kill the Lord Jesus for saying, "I and the Father are one.....The Father is in me, and I in the Father" (Jno. x. 30, 38, R. V.) they would have seen that, as manifested in Christ, "God had visited his people;" for Satan, though like "a strong man armed," had now been "come upon" by "the stronger than he" (Luke vii. 16; xi. 21, 22). When they saw the Messiah do "the works which none other man did," and wondering multitudes confess, "It was never so seen in Israel" (Jno. xv. 24; Matt. ix. 33), they would have joyfully accepted his explanation, "The Father who dwelleth in me, he doeth the works" (Jno. xiv. 10, 11). Instead of blaspheming against him (as unbelieving Jews are still doing) they would have been constrained to "believe him for the very works' sake," and to confess with Nicodemus, "Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these miracles that thou doest except God be with him" (Jno. iii. 2; xiv. 11).

The first advent, with all its wondrous manifestations of divine power, was but a foreglean of what this prophecy denotes.

"Twas like lovely starlight gleaming,
When at first his glory shone;
'Twill surpass the sunlight beaming
When he reigns on David's throne.

"Then the moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed, when the LORD (JEHOVAH) of hosts shall reign on Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously" (Isa. xxiv. 23). In that day, God "will judge the world in righteousness by (ב) that man whom he hath ordained" (Acts xvii. 31). Instead of "by," the margin of the Revised Version reads "in," which is a fair rendering of the Greek ἐν, and warranted by the testimony that "in him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily" (Col. ii. 9).

Of this glorious advent "in the day of his power" the Scripture prophesies, "Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O mighty one, with thy glory and thy majesty. And in thy majesty ride prosperously because of truth and meekness and righteousness; and thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things. Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the king's enemies; whereby the peoples fall under thee. Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: the sceptar of thy kingdom is a right sceptar" (Psa. xlv. 3-6; Heb. i. 8).

Then "the fourth beast," however "dreadful and terrible and strong exceedingly" he may be, shall be "slain and his body destroyed and given to the burning flame" (Dan. vii. 7, 11). And though "Babylon the great" may boast, "I sit a queen," yet "she shall be utterly burned with fire: for strong is the Lord God who judgeth her" (Rev. xviii. 8). That "the Lord God who judgeth her" is the Son manifesting his Father's name and power, seems clearly implied by the testimony that "the Father judgeth no man but hath committed all judgment to the Son," whom Thomas confessed to be "my Lord and my God," and whom Isaiah calls "the mighty God" (Jno. v. 22; xx. 28; Isa. ix. 6).

In ancient and modern times men have gone to opposite extremes of error concerning our Lord, some disputing his divine and others his human nature, both of which extremes are abundantly condemned by the Holy Scriptures.

THE ARK AND MODERN SCIENCE.

In an important article on "Prehistoric Commerce and Israel," which appears in the current number of The British and Foreign Evangelical Review, the writer, Dr. Howard Osgood, points to one indication which is to be found in the Bible account of the Flood. That account gives a rational measurement for a ship in the relation of breadth and depth to length. The length 450 feet, six times its breadth, 75 feet, is near the proportion which is given to ships of burden today. That the ark was not a flat-boat is made certain by the impossibility of building a flat-boat of that length and breadth that would float; it would as every flat-boatman knows, leak so badly that it could not be kept free of water; and when to the length and breadth is added 45 feet of height, the structure becomes ridiculous, a pyramid built on its apex. The men who knew enough to give these dimensions to the ark were well versed in shipbuilding, and knew, like the Cushites of South Babylonia, and of the southern shores of the Red Sea, and of the Phœnician coast, the proper proportions for a great ship that would float and resist the enormous pressure of water against her sides and bottom, for the ark drew 22½ feet of water. There is another point with respect to this vessel that has often been made the subject of ignorant jest. It is said that, however excellent and noteworthy the ark may have been, it is absolutely impossible that all the species of the animals on the earth could have been crowded into it, though only two of each were put on board. Geikie, in his article on the "Deluge," in Dr. Lindsay Alexander's edition of Kitto's Bible Dictionary, following Hugh Miller, is very positive on this point. But Dr. Osgood contends that two of all the known species of land mammalia, and of birds, reptiles and insects could have found room in the vessel of Noah, of the size given in the Bible. The ark had three decks, and its length was 450 feet, its breadth 75, and its depth 45. Subtract 30 feet for the inclination of the bow and stern and sides, then we have 400 feet by 75—that is, 30,000 square feet on each deck, or for the three decks, 90,000 square feet. The steamers carrying live stock from New York today allow 20 square feet for oxen. At this rate, on each deck, there would be room for 1,500 oxen, or 4,500 on three decks, with plenty of ventilation, as the decks were 13 feet in the clear apart. Geikie makes the number of the species of mammalia to be between 1,800 and 1,700. If so, the ark would have carried on two of its decks, and a part of the third deck, two of each of the size of an ox. But the average size, according to Professor H. A. Ward, of Rochester, and Mr. Wallace's careful classification of the species, would be that of the grey fox or common house cat. Taking then, the grey fox as the measure of all the species, and granting him even one-fourth of the size of the ox, and giving him one-fourth of the room required for the ox, all the species would not require the space, 30,000 square feet, of one deck of the ark! Wallace estimates the number of birds at 10,037; of reptiles, 976; and of lizards, 1252; of insects, 100,000 species. Taking again the average size of these species, no large amount of space would be required to hold two of each species.

THE JEWS OF HERAT.

A correspondent of the Israelit gives an interesting account of the Jews of Herat. They have a tradition that some Jews were already settled there in the age of Jeremiah. In an old Arabic history a tradition relates that Alexander the Great, on his journey to India, passed through Herat and was received by the Jews with great honor, and that Alexander told them that he had also been welcomed by the Jews of Jerusalem. That Herat is the Lord God who judgeth her" (Rev. xviii. 8). That "the Lord God who judgeth her" is a very ancient town is proved from the fact that it is mentioned in the Zend Avesta—which was written in the age of Cyrus—under the name of Herab, and it is, therefore, probable that it is identical with the Hara of the Bible, whither the King of Assyria drove the two and a half tribes who were settled on the "other side of the Jordan." Hence, the tradition is amply corroborative of there having been Jews in Herat previous to the destruction of the First Temple. Under the ancient Persian rule the Jews in that town suffered great persecutions, the kings having frequently attempted to convert them to the religion of the Persians. The Jews, however, retained firm and steadfast, and frequently sacrificed their lives in resisting these attempts. Records are kept of battles having been fought in the streets of Herat between the Parsees and the Jews, when the fire-worshipers attempted to coerce them to embrace their religion. If the lights were put out in the synagogue on the Ninth of Ab as a sign of mourning, the fire-worshipers regarded it as an affront to their religion, and they were equally offended when the synagogue was illuminated on Sabbaths and festivals, accusing the Jews of a desire to win over to themselves the favor of their god. One king levied a tax on the Jews for lighting the temples of the Parsees. At one time a king, Digrili, attempted to build a fire-temple in the quarter of the Jews at Herat, when the latter opposed him by force and ultimately prevailed. When the Mohammedan religion was adopted by the Persians, the Jews in Herat still suffered persecution. Being situated on the route to India, the Caliphs in their incursions into that country marched their armies through the town, where the Jewish inhabitants resided, and committed great depredations among the Jews, murdering and otherwise maltreating them. Many records are preserved of Jews killing their own children in order to prevent their being seized by the fire-worshipers, or Mohammedans.

Napoleon's Testimony.

In a communication inserted in the New York Observer of April 16, 1842, Prof. G. De Felice, of Montbaun, translated from a French journal the following conversation related by Count De Montholon, the faithful friend of the fallen Emperor of St. Helena:

"I know men," said Napoleon, "and I tell you that Jesus is not a man!

"The religion of Christ is a mystery which subsists by its own force, and proceeds from a mind that is not a human mind. We find in it a marked individuality which originated in a train of words and maxims unknown before. Jesus borrowed nothing from our knowledge. He exhibited in himself the perfect example of his precepts. Jesus is not a philosopher; for his proofs are miracles, and from the first his disciples adored Him. In fact, learning and philosophy are of no use for salvation; and Jesus came into the world to reveal the mysteries of heaven and the laws of the Spirit.

"Alexander, Cæsar, Charlemagne, and myself founded empires; but upon what did we rest the creation of our genius? Upon force. Jesus Christ alone founded his empire upon love; and at this hour millions of men would die for him.

"It was not a day of battle which achieved the triumph of the Christian religion in the world. No; it was a long war, a contest for three centuries, begun by the apostles, then continued by the blood of Christian generations. In this war all the kings and potentates of earth were on one side; on the other I see no army, but a mysterious force, some men scattered here and there in all parts of the world, and who have no other rallying point than a common faith in the mysteries of the cross.

"I die before my time, and my body will be given back to the earth to become food for worms. Such is the fate which so soon awaits him who has been called the great Napoleon. What an abyss between my deep misery and the eternal kingdom of Christ, which is proclaimed, loved, and adored, and which is extending over the whole earth. Call you this dying? Is it not living rather? The death of Christ is the death of a God."

Families Going West

To settle permanently, or visit, naturally seek the routes by which they can travel with the greatest comfort and with the fewest changes of cars. The favorite Pt. Wayne Route, known as the Northwest System of the Pennsylvania Lines west of Pittsburgh, offers greater facilities in this respect than any other Line, as it runs Baggage Cars, Coaches and Sleeping Cars from Pittsburgh to Chicago without change, making connection through Union Depots with the trains of Roads leading to all points in the West, Northwest and Southwest. These are great advantages to families with ladies and children, and particularly to ladies traveling without escort. For rates of fare, rates on household goods, time tables, etc., write to the nearest Ticket Agent of the Pennsylvania Lines, or to E. A. Ford, General Passenger Agent, Pittsburgh, Pa.

IN DESPONDENCY.

Sometimes there comes within the life,
The chequered life of ours,
So much of loss and pain and strife,
That our sad eyes, with tear-drops rife,
Look up and see no flowers.

A sudden sorrow clouds the day,
And the tired heart grows faint:
For strength and courage die away,
And lips that have been dumb to pray
Can only make complaint.

And life becomes, at such a time,
An unendurable thing:
There is no sound of cheering chime,
The days move on in dreary rhyme,
And hope no heart can sing.

If such a time should come to thee,—
And somewhere in the years
For every one its pain will be,—
Do not despair, but fly to see
Some sunshine through the tears.

And know that he whom sorrow visits
Receives a gift from Heaven:
His tenderness some hearts may reach
To whom the glad in vain might preach,
And joy through him is given.

Oh, then, be thou a comforter
To some sore soul that lies;
And while from those dark depths it utters,
Strange bliss to thine own heart shall flow,
And grief forgets to be.

MIZPEH NOTES.

Over yonder, ailing, failing, waning, wasting, is a Christian young girl, sitting day after day in her chair, face to face with death. I have seen her repeatedly; tranquil, quiet, and even smiling, in the very same place—simply waiting; and to be patient and courageous while going all the time down the incline—to be undaunted and unmurmuring, while growing fainter—this is something greater than the courage of the strong man riding into the smoke of battle. At least I may inquire if it is not.

A friend, who attends the Sabbath and other meetings of the much respected Baptist pastor in this town, has desired me to teach (or at least to lead the Scripture-searching enterprise of) some who are coveting a better insight into current or coming fulfillments of prophecy. I concluded to accept the invitation, and we have had three introductory meetings, with a prospect of growing numbers. One thing I wished to emphasize in my own mind, and in the presence of all orally to declare, that I had lived long enough to learn not to be dogmatic. At least, by God's grace, I truly hope to cultivate and employ modesty. I said there was danger and harm in unqualified and irrevocable committal to certain interpretations, in some departments of prophetic study. We need to have clear views as much as possible, but in cases where great differences of opinion have developed, we may have and hold our own views teachably still. And, a sense of freedom from bias is invaluable. I mean in the sense of mental surrender to another's opinion, or of a hastily formed opinion of our own. I said to my friends—"to me it seems of inestimable advantage to have a right introduction, and if possible, something as near as possible to a key, to Revelation. I do not positively affirm what that is. There may be two or three keys, but the true, if I understand the matter right, is in Rev. i. 10, the first half of the verse. An absolutely exact rendering of the verse in Greek words may be this: "I became in spirit in the Lord day." Now what is this? Is the expression Lord day equivalent to day of the Lord? If so, then what is the day of the Lord? Is it the period of time introductory to, and connected with, a change from this to the next dispensation? At least is it mainly this? Is there a particle of foundation for the current belief that it is the first day of the week? The Lord day, may in a larger sense embrace a thousand years in its application, but in its more specific intention, does it not denote the beginning, the transition time, of this long period? If so, then we have got something to start with. Again, how was John in spirit in that day? In Rev. iv. 2, he says, "And he carried me away into a desert, in spirit," and in chap. xxi. 10, "and he carried me away in spirit to a mountain great and high." In each of these cases there followed a vision of something peculiar and interesting. Then there are two things to notice, to-wit: "in spirit," not "in the spirit," and the Lord day, but not the Lord's day. And I simply close this introductory querying with the fair inquiry if John was or was not, mentally projected forward into the opening scenes of the day of the Lord. If in some inner sense, the day of the Lord began with the ascension, then in some sense, the grand scenery of the apocalypse would apply to the period immediately or rapidly following. If in the more essential sense, the day of the Lord commences eighteen hundred years after the visions of Patmos, then will there not be in the near future, the more essential fulfillment of the spectacular marvels of the book of Revelation. Was he, or was he not, projected forward in spirit and in vision to the times we are now soon to enter upon? This is a fair question—not to be answered with dogmatic assurance of assumption but humbly and intelligently.

If some should ask doubtfully, how is it possible to suppose so great dramatic transactions as the apocalypse unfolds, can be accomplished in any important sense, in the future, I might with much modesty suggest the possibility of great fulfillments in a very brief period, when days are literal and not symbolic. And how can there be great and majestic fulfillments yet future, and still the redemptive and saving hand of the Redeemer coming to Zion, stretched out to save his wandering people, as a thing imminent and even indistinctly possible? I need only reply with the promise to save Philadelphia out of coming trouble. In a like translation easily enough possible to Him who can rescue Peter at the last instant of resentful peril? How ever, I pass this by.

Another question interests me, recently, and I might say, always. What is the best attitude of Christians, as the Lord is on his way to save Philadelphians? That is a right question. Suppose we suggest something. A good attitude is

1. A teachable one, not obstinately opinionated.

2. An unsectarian one, not partizan, narrow, and enslaved to authority that prescribes for us what we must accept or adopt or inculcate.

3. An attitude of sympathy for others, sympathy, pity and love for all, all the poor, and erring, and sinful and lost, of Adam's countless progeny.

4. An attitude of doing good to the children of God—seeking to teach and encourage and assist them in the love and liberty of God and of Christ—and doing good to all the world.

5. An attitude of praying in hope and of mental perception of God over us in love.

6. An attitude of firm attachment and adhesion to the great divine Master—of willingness and determination to give life, if need be, in witness for him—should persecution arise, or exigency require.

7. An attitude of indifference to all the glitter and glory and vainly imagined charm of things coveted by the few or many, who walk by sight and not by faith, who live for the present world and not that which is to come.

Of course, other things may well be added, but seven will do for now.

Looking abroad over the world, I am sadly and ever painfully impressed with the evidence of the almost universal discredit of the Bible assurance of the transitoriness of things. Why the palatial residences of the storers up of earth's treasure? Why the magnificent blocks of buildings imperially costly? Why the churches of elaborate architecture? Our Lord lived simply. He loved the company of the poor—why should not I? He taught the briefness and uncertainty of temporal things. He showed the transition possibilities of any moment. Why should I then desire mighty posts of silver, or marble, or gold, and say they are only fastenings into earth? There is a little bed in the dust for every rounded, and every hour-long owner of estates. There are vaults for money and there are vaults for the dead. There are casket boxes in the armories, that look like coffins. Am I to live for this treacherous and dangerous little life of hours and heart-beats, and frail mortal organism? I would rather be as Jesus was, and think as he does, and see, as clearly as he saw, that all things are mutable and transient. What have I to do, to build mansions, frightful for their lying glitter, and heart-piercing for their pompous altitudes and almost conceited magnificence. The New Jerusalem is coming. What should I love? The poor palaces of man's proud ambition, or the sinless and stainless and blessed mansions of God? If I believe him I shall look for the second coming, and not set my love on the lordliness of poor, mad doomed Babylon.

The Book of Jobab, called Job, Son of Zare, Son of Rraguel, Son of Heseu, Son of Isaac, Son of Abrahama: as According to the Septuagint.

CHAP. 5.

1. Invoke and see if any one will hearken unto thee, or whether thou wilt behold one of the sanctified angels.

2. Wrath, forsooth, will take away the heedless; and zeal putteth to death the erring.

3. I indeed have seen the heedless taking root, but straightway their livelihood was devoured.

4. Their sons shall come to be far from salvation; they shall dance attendance at the doors of their inferiors and there shall be no one to deliver.

5. Yea what they have gathered, the just shall eat and they shall not be delivered from calamities, their strength shall be drawn away from them as with a siphon.

6. For not from out the earth was weary toil to come forth, nor shall pain sprout up from out the mountains,

7. But man is begotten to weary toil, while the young vultures fly through high places.

8. Notwithstanding I forsooth will beseech the Lord and invoke the Lord who is sole master of all,

9. Who worketh great things and unsearchable, yea glorious and out-of-the-way things of which there is no number:

10. Who giveth rain to the earth, who sendeth forth water to that which is under the heavens:

11. Who exalteth the lowly and bringeth loss to him who exalteth himself:

12. Who changeth the counsels of the subtle: their hand shall effect nothing true.

13. He it is who apprehendeth the wise in their thoughtfulness and the intricately woven counsel hath he brought to nought.

14. Thick darkness will meet them by day, and they shall have groped at midday as though it were night.

15. They will have perished in war; and will be unable to come out of the hand of the able one.

16. But the unable shall have hope, and the mouth of the unjust be stopped.

17. Blessed happy the man whom the Lord hath reproved: yea disapprove not the instruction of the Almighty,

18. For he maketh sorry and he restoreth again: he hath smitten and his hands have healed.

19. Six times will he deliver thee from necessity's straits and the seventh time evil shall not touch thee.

20. In famine he will deliver thee from death: In war he will loose thee from an iron hand;

21. From the scourge of the tongue will he hide thee, and thou shalt not be in dread of coming evils.

22. Thou shalt laugh to scorn wrong-doers and transgressors, and of wild beasts thou shalt not be in dread:

23. For wild beasts will be at peace with thee.

24. After that thou shalt know that thy household will be at peace; and thy tabernacle shall not sin in its daily life.

25. Thou shalt know that thy seed will be much, and thy offspring like the all-embracing verdure of the field as it were.

26. Thou shalt come to burial like the timely grain that is being harvested in its season; or like the grain-heap of the threshing floor that hath been stored away house by house.

27. Lo these things have we traced out in this wise; this is what we have heard; know thou then for thyself whether thou hast done anything.

The Blessing of Home.

"What a friend we have in Jesus"—
Sang a little child, one day:
And a weary woman listened
To the darling's happy lay.

All her life seemed dark and gloomy,
And her heart was sad with care;—
Sweetly rang out baby's treble—
"All our sins and sorrows bear."

She was passing out the Portier
Who could carry every one
And the one who daily listened
Needed that dear Helper so!

Sin and grief were heavy burdens
For a fainting soul to bear—
But the baby, singing, bade her
"Take it to the Lord in prayer."

With a simple, trusting spirit,
Weak and worn, she turned to God,
Asking Christ to take her burden,
As he was the sinner's Lord.

Jesus was the only refuge,
He could take her sin and care,
And He blessed the weary woman
When she came to Him in prayer.

And the happy child, still singing,
Little knew she had a part
In God's mysterious work of bringing Peace unto a troubled heart.

A Variety of Good Works.

Without variety, said a great preacher once, how tame our gardens, with every flower in form and color the counterpart of another; and how monotonous the music of early morn, did every lark in the sky, linnet in the bush, rook and ring-dove in the woods, all utter the same notes! But variety characterizes every department of nature. Each lamb of the flock has a bleat known to its mother; each rose on the bush has its own shape and shade of color; and there is not a lark that hangs carolling in the clouds but has a voice recognized by the brood above whose grassy nest she sings her morning hymn, calling the drowsy world to rise for worship and for work.

Nor is this variety anywhere more remarkable than in mankind. It is calculated that there are fourteen hundred millions of our race scattered over the five continents and countless islands of the globe. Now, while in their grand characteristics, in their features, organs, voices, limbs and general form these all resemble each other, yet there are not two faces, for instance, out of these fourteen hundred millions, which are exactly alike.

Nor does a rich, boundless, divine variety characterize and adorn only this world of ours in the living creatures of its lands and seas—the shells which strew its shores, the flowers and fruits of its fertile plains, its shaggy mountains up to their snowy crests. It shines above us in stars fixed or moving, stars single, stars in pairs, stars in clusters, some sparkling with borrowed, others with native light; in the sun that runs his daily rounds, and comets that with fiery locks streaming out behind them, rush away into darkness, nor return for a hundred, perhaps for a thousand years. And high above that starry firmament, amid the splendors of the upper sanctuary, in angels and archangels, in cherubim and seraphim, in saints on higher thrones and crowns of brighter glory, in the various orders of redeemed, and the various honors of the ransomed, we see a manifold and magnificent diversity in the works of God.

Flower Girl of Pompeii.

Eighteen hundred years ago the city of Pompeii was buried beneath the ashes of Vesuvius. At that time it was a prosperous place, carrying on an extensive commerce with the Campanian towns, and inhabited by a cultivated and intelligent people.

Suddenly, without warning, the busy hum of industry was stilled forever, and Pompeii was swept from sight. A dark cloud was seen hovering over Vesuvius, loud subterranean thunders were heard; then the fiery streams of lava poured down the sides of the mountain, and, falling upon Herculaneum, buried it deep beneath the fearful flood. Lava, ashes and cinders fell, too, upon Pompeii, and no trace of the busy city remained to tell where it had flourished. For eighteen hundred years the buried city remained unknown, shrouded in deep mystery.

Various excavations have brought to light much of the ancient city, and the visitor can walk amid the ruins and see how the Pompeians lived, and the industries in which they were engaged when their busy hands were arrested forever. Here can be seen the remains of numberless fountains finely sculptured, beautiful temples, showing exquisite carving, well executed fresco paintings, the ruins of fine houses and theatres, and stables where the wealthy kept their horses.

From what has been unearthed it is easy to see that the Pompeians were not only a luxurious and pleasure-loving people, but that they had attained considerable skill in the arts and manufactures. The tables and chairs found are of carved bronze; beautiful vases, cups, dishes, and bottles of iridescent glass, finely chased gold jewelry, some set with gems, and exquisite cameo rings, can be seen, and attest to the skill of the makers.

The artist finds much to interest him in these relics of the past, and of especial interest to him are the old paintings on the walls and elsewhere, the colors of many being admirably preserved. Not long ago a painting was brought to light representing the judgment of Solomon, and which is now in the Naples Museum. It contains nine-one figures among which are the king holding a scepter, a counsellor, soldiers, two women, an infant, and a group of spectators. Though not particularly well drawn, the figures are effective, and the coloring admirably preserved.

Among the painters who have made a study of the ancient life of Pompeii is Joseph Goodman. "The Flower Girl of Pompeii" is one of his happiest efforts, and brings vividly before us the dark-eyed Italian girl who sold flowers on the streets of Pompeii, and who was involved in the terrible destruction that fell upon the unfortunate city. She stands beside one of the numerous fountains that adorned Pompeii attired in the dress of the times, with her hands raised to shade her brow from the burning sun, as she seems to be looking for a purchaser to hasten her stock of flowers.—Demorest's Monthly.

Dear Children:

While I am communicating my thoughts to the dear little ones whom I have never seen, it naturally imparts a longing desire to become acquainted with them, this is more especially felt by one who writes, and receives no answer, not that I would have you think I expect one, yea I do, but from the Lord, I know in whom I believe, and I am quite sure he will give the increase. He has left on record a command which is "Feed my Lambs," in my feeble way I am endeavoring to do this, but would like to see your bright, happy faces, and gather you around me, as I used to my Sunday School class, but as I cannot have this pleasure, I am delighted to imitate to a measure, the little bee, who hives her sweet morsel for others, as well as for her own necessities. But how is her busy toil accomplished? Does she gather her sweetness from the leaf, or from the surface of the flower? from these she may sip the sparkling dew drops, which may form a part of her breakfast, but her delicious fruit, which is the sweetest of all things, she gathers by diving deep into the very heart of the flower, where the reproducing germ finds its hiding place. From these secret cells, she enriches her wings, and covers her tiny limbs, with her golden sweetness. Not satisfied with her gleanings from one garden, she eagerly seeks the gems of nature from others, and from the spacious fields she brings the produce of many an hour's toil. She does not do her work grudgingly, or of necessity, but humming as it were a song of praise, until she deposits the fruit of her labor. Nature has kindly provided her with a weapon of warfare, lest any one should hinder her progress.

Being accustomed to the lovely fragrance of beautiful flowers she quickly manifests her strong dislike to any person who has an offensive smell. Her chief joy is in having a leader to instruct her in the way she should go, which is "straight as a bee line." Early in the morning, she welcomes the first beams that kiss the earth, and sometimes after the Ruler of the day has run his course, her joyful tune is heard, gathering sweetness while journeying home. When she returns she finds no confusion there, order is in every cell, although each bee has its own little wall of wax to construct, they work together as one united, happy family. A lazy drone finds no home among them. Industry, punctuation, cleanliness, order, sweet harmony is unwearied toil compose this little band. Children beloved, let us gather sweetness, and not the bitterness of evil, learning from her precious lesson how to toil.

Your affectionate Teacher.

NOTICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS:

The book is truthful, recent and instructive, every way worthy of the attention of those who prefer calm argument to sensational speculation.—The Reformer.

We are desirous to express our sympathy with the general scope of the book, and to bespeak for it a wide and cordial reception.—The Messenger.

The volume before us is evidently the product of a thoughtful mind, and deserves the careful study of every Christian, being of a very comprehensive character, and based on Scripture. Certainly it is the best work on the subject which has come under our notice.—The Sydney Observer.

The treatment shows that the author has studied well and patiently digested his theme before writing upon it, and we feel as we read page after page, stimulated rather than clogged in our inquiry. .....The aim of the volume before us is to set the truth clearly before the mind, and so restore to its place in the consciousness of the church the hope that was once so dear to God's suffering saints, and is still so to many, but which is always unwelcome to a worldly, cold and formal church, and hated by the world. This little work will be cordially read with pleasure by all who take interest in prophetic subjects.—Rev. Nathaniel West, D. D.

THE COMING AGE,

—1878—

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. WESTBEE.—

This is a text-book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is now the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the issues are inquiring: "What are the signs of the times?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound researches and discoveries made manifest in scientific explorations, the difficulties of trade-combinations, railways, ocean steamers and the telephone, by which time and space are constantly being annihilated, and many similar forces, point unmistakably to the fact that we have risen on the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

This Coming Age is the product of laborious research in reading a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It also evinces, and contains many passages of thrilling, and absorbing interest. Its whole subject is presented in a clear and logical manner, showing in a clear and logical manner the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of popular interpretations, and presents matters upon a complete or other basis, in clear and rich reasoning, the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are nearer hand.

Latest Light on our Coming the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the fruit of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of bygone ages and shows that the same hand is the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It shows how this supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the will of the Unconquerable Will. Wherever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the Divine power of the living Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $2.00. Send to the office for this work.

THE MILLENNIUM, OR THE THOUSAND YEARS.

The thousand years' reign is designated by Lange, the commentator, the "pearl of true doctrine;" and by Dr. Schaff, the "precious hope." This doctrine was the prevailing belief, the common faith of the church, for the first two centuries and a half, or more. Indeed, during the whole of the first three centuries and a part of the fourth, vast numbers of Christians believed in the second coming of Christ and the millennial glory that is to follow. And no doctrine was more dear or more precious to the early church than this, and it should be equally so to us. They looked forward with joyous anticipation for his appearing and his kingdom. Their sufferings for righteousness' sake were so great that they saw no prospect of peace until the Prince of Peace should come again. They expected no millennium prior to that event. But when an entirely different and greatly improved state of things was brought about by Constantine, they gradually thought less of the promised millennium. With temporal prosperity under his reign, and the terrible persecutions which had been experienced under paganism ceasing, the church allowed the doctrine of the millennium to decline. Having outward peace, and the offense of the cross having ceased, they became too satisfied with things as they were, and in a great measure lost their hope in the predicted reign of Christ. Bengel says, When Christianity became a worldly power by Constantine, the hope of the future was weakened by the joy over the present success." In their commentary, Jamison and Fausset say, "Under Constantine, Christianity being established, Christians began looking at its existing temporal prosperity, as fulfilling the prophecies, and ceased to look for Christ's promised reign on earth." And Kurtz remarks, "As the aspect of outward affairs changed under Constantine, those views lost their hold on men's minds. The church now prepared for a long-continued period of temporal prosperity, and the State-church of that time forgot the millennial glory of the future." Calvin also fell into the error "that the 1,000 years dated from Constantine."

Now these are facts which are not made enough of, as they show, first, how the early Christians, before so many got tainted with Pagan philosophy, understood the Scriptures; and, second, how after getting tainted with it, they understood them, or misunderstood them, and so departed from the apostolic faith. And they are facts also which unbelievers in the millennium have always found to be a great difficulty. Romish writers, who have always had a high opinion of the early Christian fathers,—we mean those who wrote before the degeneracy under Constantine,—designate their view on this subject as an error, thus using a comparatively mild term; but since the time that Pope Damasus decided that it was a heresy, Romish writers, of course, have been strong in their language in denouncing it as a heresy. But, thanks be to God, we have learned how much value to set upon the decision of the Pope, or the church of which he is the head.

So plainly does the Revelation teach the Millennium, that some of the Christian fathers who degenerated from the Scriptural doctrine, did not attempt to dispute that the millennium was found there; it was too clearly taught for that: so they denied the Revelation; they rejected it, and said it was not an inspired book. But when they had learned from Origen to allegorise, and put a mystical or figurative sense upon plain Scripture, they admitted the inspiration of the Apocalypse. They accepted the teachings of John after they had learned the art of interpreting him to mean what he did not say. Those who remained true to the apostolic faith, maintained the doctrine of the Millennium; those who apostatized from the apostolic faith, sought the overthrow of the millennial doctrine. Were this fact more generally known in the church, fewer we think would oppose the doctrine. We are persuaded that many who do oppose it, little think that in doing so they are going in opposition to the primitive church, and treading in the steps of the apostate church.

It was in the dark ages when Popery was supreme, when some Scriptural truths were hidden, and others were disfigured by human additions, that the millennium of the Apocalypse was almost lost sight of.

After Origen had done what he could to disparage the doctrine, and heresy had begun to spread more widely, a number of others, men of learning, and notwithstanding their inconsistencies, no doubt men of some piety also, lent the influence of their names against it. Then in a while Popery began to grow, and as it grew up, pure Christianity went down. Thus it was the introduction into the church of Romish error that weakened the faith in the millennium, and after a while the general spread of Papal error that almost destroyed it. Speaking of the millennium, Dr. Burnett says, "It never pleased, but always gave offence to the church of Rome, because it did not suit that scheme of Christianity which they have drawn."

Some have denounced the Millennium as an earthly, or a carnal reign, in which men would be allowed to gratify their sensual desires without restraint. But this caricature of the doctrine is believed to be traceable to two of its enemies, who endeavored to represent it, namely to Caius the presbyter, and Dionysius Alexandrinus. The latter sneered at the Millennium in a work which he wrote about the middle of the third century.

THE TRUE CHARACTER OF THE PRESENT DISPENSATION.
Part I.

"Simeon hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for His Name."—Acts xv. 14.

Our subject this evening is, "The True Character of the Present Dispensation;" and it is one of primary importance, because a mistake here would run through all our views of prophecy, and more or less vitiate all our interpretations. Unless we have a correct apprehension of this our present subject, we shall fall into endless errors by applying to ourselves parables, prophecies, and promises, which in many cases belong to an age yet future, and in which, personally, we have little or no concern.

Our subject being the present Dispensation, our first care must evidently be to see that we clearly understand what that word means. It is a strictly Scriptural word, and occurs four times in the Epistles of St. Paul, but nowhere else. That Apostle speaks of—

1. The "dispensation of the Gospel," as in 1 Cor. ix. 17, "For if I do this thing," i. e., preach the gospel "willingly, I have a reward; but if against my will, a dispensation of the gospel is committed unto me."

2. The "dispensation of God," as in Col. i. 25, "Whereof I am made a minister, accord to the dispensation of God, which is given to me for you, to fulfil the word of God."

3. The "dispensation of the grace of God," as in Eph. iii. 2, "If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to youward."

4. The "dispensation of the fulness of times," as in Eph. i. 10, "That in the dispensation of the fulness of times He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in Him."

The English word "dispensation," however, gives but a very imperfect and inaccurate idea of the original. Economy would be a much nearer approach to its true meaning. The Greek word is οἰκονομία, which the English "economy," as you may perceive, very closely resembles in sound. But then it must not be understood in the common sense of frugality or carefulness in our expenditure, which is its ordinary meaning. Its signification is wholly different. The word οἰκονομία is compounded of two words, οἶκος which means a house, and νέμω, to regulate, deal out, distribute, etc. The whole, therefore, stands for "the general management and regulation of a household or family."

Now God's people are his "household" or "family." For example, Eph. iii. 15, "Of whom (God) the whole family in heaven and earth is named."

Hence the word "dispensation" has come to be applied to the method or system of management or regulation which God has at various times adopted towards his family or church; and of these systems of administrations there have been already four, which may be termed "dispensations:"—

1. The "Ademic," as we may term it, which prevailed from the expulsion from Paradise to the Deluge, of which we know little or nothing.

2. The "Patriarchal," from Noah to Moses, during which every father was both king and priest in his own family, his authority absolute, and his will the only law.

3. The Mosaic," when God's people were for the first time collected together in one nation, having their own peculiar laws and governors.

4. The "Christian," which exhibits a change of religion only; and yet hardly a change, for Christianity is but the completion of ancient types and laws, the Lord Jesus being the substance and fulfillment of all these "shadows of good things to come."

Now, friends, I crave your earnest attention to what I am about to say, for it is of the greatest importance to the right understanding of our present subject. Had the Jews, as a nation, after the resurrection and ascension of our Lord, been brought to repentance by the preaching of his Apostles, had they nationally mourned, as hereafter we know they will mourn, with godly sorrow over "Him whom they have pierced," and acknowledged him as their true Messiah, we may venture to say—I humbly hope without presumption—there would have been no change of dispensation, such as that which actually took place. "Salvation" would still as hitherto have been "of the Jews." The "outcasts of Israel" would then have been brought forth from exile and, reunited as we know that hereafter they shall be, to the "dispersed of Judah," they would have formed one nation upon the mountains of Israel. The Lord Christ would have at once returned to sit upon the throne of David; the reign of righteousness have immediately commenced; and the course of time run on smoothly and uninterruptedly to the final consummation of all things.

Such, had repentance been then granted to Israel, we may fairly infer would have been the course of events up to the very end. In that case we Gentiles must have occupied a standing very far inferior to that which, in the all-wise providence of God, has been allotted to us. We could then have been admitted only as proselytes, and as proselytes only could we have become partakers of Israel's promises.

But this was not to be. Our gracious and common Father had reserved for us a far better portion than that of mere proselytes. To this intent were the Jews suffered to persist in their impenitence until "wrath overtook them to the uttermost," that we might be raised to a higher standing, and be made partakers of better promises.

Thus God's promises respecting Israel appeared to have failed of their end; but it was with the gracious design of bringing in the Gentiles. I say appeared to have failed, because it could be only in appearance, all things having been surely ordered and foreordained by him before the foundations of the earth were laid. He who knows the end from the beginning can never fail of any purpose, as we understand failure; but what I mean is simply this, that the whole aspect of things did then present the appearance of failure the most complete.

Hence, so to speak, there was a sudden break in the chain of promises, commencing from those to us Gentiles, most memorable words addressed to the envious and blaspheming Jews of Antioch by Paul and Barnabas, "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles." The inference from which seems clear, that had the Jews received instead of rejecting the word of God, the apostles would not have turned to the Gentiles.

From the moment these words of doom were uttered, the thread of prophecy was broken off abruptly, and will not be taken up again until the purposes of God respecting the Gentiles, or to use the Savior's own words, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. From that moment the Divine purpose, as stated in our text, came into operation, and has been carrying out ever since: God did visit, and is now visiting the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name. Nor will any further change take place until all those from among the Gentiles who shall be heirs of salvation are gathered into his church.

The whole mystery is revealed in the Epistle to the Romans chap. xi. Speaking of Israel under the symbol of the garden, or cultivated olive, he says that some of the branches were broken off in order that the Gentiles whom he likens to branches of the wild or uncultivated olive, should, contrary to nature, be grafted in. Then seeing them in danger of being elated with pride at the preference thus shown, he adds a solemn warning, ver. 17, 18. If, he says, some of the branches be broken off, and thou, being a wild olive tree, wert grafted in among them, and with them partakest of the root and fatness of the olive tree; boast not against the branches; but if thou boast, (i. e. if in neglect of this warning thou wilt persist in boasting, then remember that) thou bearest not the root, but the root thee. Again, ver. 20, 21, Because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by faith. Be not high minded, but fear. For if God spared not the [illegible] branches, take heed lest [illegible] of thee. Once [illegible] they also, [illegible] lief, [illegible] able to graft them again.

Here then you see how simply and how clearly this familiar illustration unfolds to us the true character of the dispensation under which we live. The Jews, or natural branches, were broken off in order that the Gentiles, branches of the wild olive, might be grafted in; and during the whole continuance of that operation of mingled judgment and mercy, the progress of things is, as it were, suspended, and the harp of prophecy is hushed and silent. Again, the natural branches are to be restored to their own olive tree; and as soon as ever that begins to come to pass, the harp resounds once more with its glad music, the thread of long-predicted events is resumed, and advances onward towards the grand and final consummation as though this interruption had never occurred.

To make this subject yet more clear, the present dispensation may be compared to a parenthesis in a book or letter. Some of my hearers may not know what is meant by a parenthesis, and I wish to be understood by all. A parenthesis is a sentence within a sentence, inserted to explain something mentioned, but which is not essential to the main subject, and which might be omitted without injury to the sense. One of the longest parentheses to be found in any book occurs in Eph. iii. 1.: For this cause, the Apostle says, I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles; then he breaks off abruptly to enlarge upon this expression; nor does he resume the thread of his discourse until the beginning of the following chapter. The whole of the third is therefore a parenthesis, of great importance in itself, but not essential to his subject, and which might be left out altogether without in the least altering the sense. This you will at once perceive by connecting the first verse of the third chapter with the latter clause of the first verse of the fourth. The sentence will then read, For this cause, I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called. The whole of the third chapter therefore, from the second verse to the end, is a parenthesis, and might be entirely omitted without in the least altering, or even weakening, the sense.

Now this affords a very apt illustration of the age or era of time in which we are at present living, which on that account has been called by some writers a parenthetical dispensation. The dealings of God with the Jewish nation stopped suddenly, as it were, upon their obstinate and willful rejection of the gospel. From that moment, cast out from the divine favor, they ceased to be God's people. The thread of prophecy was broken off. The fulfilment of the ancient prophecies which concerned their name and nation was suspended, and a new state of things introduced, infinitely important in itself, but having no necessary connection either with that which went before or with that which shall follow after. During this parenthesis or interval, our text is being fulfilled by the calling in of the Gentiles; but as soon as their fulness has come in, the thread will be resumed again, just as if no such interruption had ever happened.

This break, or interval of suspense, is most remarkable; and unless it be fully recognized any attempt at a consistent interpretation of the prophetic word must prove a failure, and end in confusion and disappointment. The fact is that, with exception of a few general promises, hardly any of the prophecies either of the Old or New Testaments, are applicable to the present age. They all relate to Israel; cluster round Israel; converge from all sides upon Israel; and, let it be observed, upon Israel in times and under circumstances yet clearly future.

The candid inquirer will very soon become convinced of this startling fact, that the present dispensation, though unutterably rich in blessing, is almost wholly without any prophetic utterances concerning it. Yet for centuries this fact has been ignored, and commentators have gone on, from age to age, applying all the prophecies of the Old Testament to the Gentile Church, to the entire and not seldom even scornful exclusion of their true and lawful owners. One example only of the mode of interpretation long in use will suffice to show the extent to which this misapplication has been carried. In Isaiah xi. 13 occurs this passage: The envy also of Ephraim shall depart, and the adversaries of Judah shall be cut off: Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim; in evident allusion to the bitter enmity existing between the two kingdoms ever since the days of Rehoboam. But passing over this, which is the obvious sense of the passage commentators have expounded those appellations, the one of Churchmen and the other of Dissenters. So the sacred text is here made to utter a prediction that in those happy times Dissenters shall not envy Churchmen, nor Churchmen vex Dissenters; whilst Ephraim and Judah are despoiled of their inheritance and their very names ignored, as though they had no concern whatever in that glorious promise, which seems at least to relate to them alone and exclusively! No wonder that prophecy has been a sealed book for so many ages; and that Christian people have turned away with disgust from its perusal, when such-like ludicrous interpretations have been gravely put forth as truth.

If now any of my hearers be desirous of entering upon the rich field of study which the word of prophecy presents to their view, open as it surely is to the humblest of Christ's flock, I would admonish them earnestly to bear in mind these two simple cautionary rules:—

1. Believe that God means just what he says, and nothing neither more or less. For example, that when he says Judah he means Judah, and not Gentile Churchmen.

2. Be careful always to ascertain to what age or era of the world any prophecy belongs, that so you may avoid the grand error of confounding the dispensations of God, by applying to one what properly belongs to another.

Neglecting these simple rules you will inevitably fall into confusion; whereas by bearing them constantly in mind, and applying them in each case as it arises, you will find increasing light, as well as increasing pleasure, in your study of the prophetic Scriptures.—William Ker, in Rainbow.

Who Made Him a Drunkard.

"Your father's a drunkard," Said pretty May Bell: The scorn of her accent No language can tell; She wound a gold neck chain 'Round her finger so fair, And shook back the long curls Of her beautiful hair.

And Bess, the drunkard's child, Bared her white face, Feeling deeply, so deeply, The shame and disgrace; As she wiped the bright tears That were falling like rain, The haughty girl laughed Who had given her pain.

A boy, tall and bright As a boy could be, Was untangling his kite In a tall maple tree, He could hear every word, He could see every look, Poor Bess with her slate And her old tattered book.

An indignant flush Dyed his cheek like a rose, As he viewed proud May Bell In her beautiful clothes; Down from the wide branch, Quick as thought, something fell! "Who made him a drunkard? Will you answer, May Bell?

Or shall I tell the story? I know it all through! John Bell made a drunkard Of poor William Drew! He sells him the rum That's destroying his life, And fast making beggars Of children and wife!"

As he led Bessie on, Having thus fired the blame, May looked after the two Through her tears of shame. "Oh!—can it be true, then, The story he told? Does my father make drunkards Of men, for their gold?"

Pity for Ruin's Victims.

Ladies and gentlemen, I appeal to all of you—I appeal to every sensible and sensitive heart in England and America, to this divine feeling of pity. Do we not, must we not, feel pity when we think of the hundreds and thousands of men who become the victims of a dead product which is potent enough to destroy souls for whom Christ died? Must we not feel pity, for the ravages which are caused by this deadliest of all human curses? Do we not feel pity for the men whom we have probably seen and known, who because of drink are living in its pollution and going to deaths of blasphemy, and are giving back to the God who made them nothing but the dust of their bodies and the shipwreck of their souls? Have we no pity for the thousands who are pouring poison into the veins of youth until its root becomes as bitterness and its blasphemy comes up as fruit? Have we no pity for the families, the husbands and wives on whose hearthstones are burning, because of drink, the very fires of hell?

Have we no pity for the mothers whose hearts are rent with anguish at the fate of those their offspring? Do we not feel for the unmotherly mothers who well-nigh turn womanhood to laughter and motherhood to horror? Have we no pity for the poor miserable children? Is there no voice strong enough to plead "like angels, trumpet-tongued, against the deep damnation of their taking off of these children?" —who, in the language of Southey, are not so much born into the world as damned into the world, damned and predestined, as it were, to live lives of disease and degradation because of the drink in the midst of which they are brought up, and of which they have the hereditary taint in their very veins? Must children year after year in these our Christian lands—in England at any rate, if not in America—pass through the fire to this Moloch, in numbers infinitely greater than were ever burned in the valley of Hinnom? [Applause.] I, for one, cannot but feel deep pity for these, and I feel pity for England, which for two centuries, has been writhing in the dark places of these licensed temptations—pity not only for England, but for the whole race of mankind, which is raising up the cry of anguish from every polluted continent, which yet cherishes and even fondles in its bosom this venomous and deadly asp. Alas! of every curse I have ever heard of, this is a curse in which the entail might be cut off in this very generation. And yet the race of man, bewildered by epigrams, baffled by sophistries, blinded by conceit, seduced by pleasure, and rendered callous by greed, goes on enjoying and even rewarding the production of this fatal cause of evil among themselves, until one is forced to cry, "Let the heavens burst and drown with deluge of rain the feeble vassals of lust and wine."—Canon Farrar's Speech in New York.

Dear Children:

In this letter I would like to give you a riddle, some boys and girls are pleased to hear thoughts expressed in this way. We read "it is the glory of the Lord to conceal a thing, but the honor of kings is to search out a matter," no doubt our blessed Lord clothed his precious sayings in parables to stimulate the mind to study more deeply, but he was very anxious that they understood all he taught them, therefore Jesus calls the one who is instructed in the things concerning the kingdom of God, a Scribe, which means a king's writer. Such an one is entrusted with the king's thoughts, this makes his pen, the pen of a ready writer. He no longer pays another to think for him, for he is like a householder, 'not a tenant' and from this he brings forth out of his treasury, things new and old, even wisdom's pleasant fruits, laid up for the diligent seeker, whose beautiful expositions plainly teach, the old can never decay, because of the life-giving influence of the precious new. In the Scriptures, we read of a man wonderfully endued with strength, the meaning of his name is, "He who ministers." He was an Israelite, but desired a bride from among the Gentiles. After he sought her out, he entreated his father and mother to get her, they were surprised he should seek a wife from thence, for they knew not it was of the Lord. They journeyed to a place which name signifies "A figure or image," on their way they passed the vineyards belonging to that place, and behold a young lion roared against him, and the Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him, and he rent the lion as he would have rent a kid. After a time he passed that way again, and he turned aside to see the carcass of the lion, and behold there was a swarm of bees, and honey in the carcass, and he took some in his hands, and went on eating; he gave some to his parents, but he did not tell them from whence it came. When he was united to his bride, he spread before her people a marriage feast, which continued seven, or a perfection of days, and at this feast the bridegroom put forth a riddle, offering a change of raiment and costly gift to any Gentile guest who could expound it. The riddle was this, "Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness." Children beloved, this is a type, or figure of something true, a pattern of heavenly things, of which Jesus Christ is the substance.

The young lion coming forth from the vineyards was rent by the mighty Spirit of God. And the Lion of the tribe of Judah offered himself up through the Eternal Spirit. The marriage, or gospel feast was not spread for the Gentiles, until after the slaying of our blessed Redeemer. The Jewish people fasted of the sweetness, and was invited as the chief guests to the gospel feast, but their eyes were blind as to the mystery from whence the honey came. They knew not that the souls of the Book could never be opened, unless Judah's lion be slain, no sweetness was there until the Strong One suffered death, then many found shelter in the rent body, a united family hived there, and the fruit of their busy labor, is the sweetest of all things. This is the burden of the riddle which I will endeavor to make plain.

Jesus declared, man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. He also said, I have meat to eat ye know not of, for my meat and my drink is to do the will of him that sent me, therefore the Lord Jesus Christ was the true Ester, from whom came the spiritual meat, and being made strong by a glorious resurrection from the dead, he has lived for others living words "which are sweeter than honey, or the honey comb." This lesson may be too deep for your young mind to grasp, but I long to unfold the wonderful things in the Old Testament, by the living truths of the New. "Blessed are those eyes that have not seen, and yet have believed."

Your affectionate Teacher.

E. COFFMAN.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalized saints as joint heirs with him in the governmental of the nations: the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as preparatives to the receiving of the remission of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THE PLEIADES.

Speaking of God's majesty and power Job says:—"Which maketh Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, and the chambers of the South," Job. ix. 9: and again:—"Canst thou bind the sweet influence of Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion?" Ch. xxxviii. 31.

PLEIADES is the name given to that cluster of stars so well known to every one as the "Seven Stars." The original [word—כִּימָה] Kima—means, as defined by Gesenius, a heap or cluster. Homer, Iliad, B. XVIII. 485, 486, speaks of this beautiful assemblage of stars—"On it also [i. e. the shield of Archilles Vulcan represented] all the constellations with which the heaven is crowned, the Pleiades, the Hyades, and the strength of Orion."

The Pleiades are sometimes called Vergiliæ—"Virgins of Spring"—because the sun enters this cluster in the season of blossoms about the 18th of May. At this time "the winter disappears; the streams are unlocked; the earth is covered with grass and flowers; the air is sweet and balmy; and a happy influence seems to set in over the world."

There is also another signification belonging to the Hebrew word rendered "Sweet influences" which is "bands." The question then would be whether Job could bind this constellation into the star-bundle that so beautifully ornaments the diadem of Spring as a cluster of brilliants. There is a grand astronomical speculation entertained by some notable names who have explored the wonders of those many systems that, taken together, make up "the heaven of heavens," that all the countless multitude of stars are but the individual members of one grand system revolving in untold and incalculable periods of time around some mighty central orb. Madeler, a German astronomer, in a work published in 1846, advanced the hypothesis of the existence of a central body, preponderating in mass, as the universal center of gravity about which the whole stellar universe revolves. He fixed upon Alcyone, the brightest star in the cluster, sometimes called "the light of the Pleiades," as this centre. A wonderful discovery has been recently made that invests this collection of suns with a renewed interest. This discovery seems to favor the supposition of Gesenius that the word maamaddoth, translated sweet influences is to be taken in the acceptation of bands in accordance with the Septuagint, which renders the phrase — συνῤῥας δε δεσμον Πλειαδος - "Dost thou comprehend the band of the Pleiades." There is an elegant poetical allusion to these words of Job—"Canst thou bind the brilliant rosettes of the Pleiades?" Which would mean —"Who can say that he has placed this collection of brilliants as a rosette in the sky?" The following is an account of the discovery alluded to above.

NEW WONDERS IN THE HEAVENS.

A discovery of extraordinary interest has just been made by Paul and Prosper Henry, the ingenious and laborious star-gazers of the Paris observatory. By means of their new photographing telescope they have found a nebula in the Pleiades which appears to be connected with the star Maia, one of the members of that famous group. The most powerful telescopes have failed to show any trace of this strange phenomenon when it is sought for with the eye alone. But it clearly impresses its image upon the photographic plate exposed to its radiation.

The Messrs. Henry have published a drawing of the new nebula. It is of a very singular shape. Starting from the star, it sweeps away in a broad curve which gradually fades into invisibility at a distance of some three minutes of arc. It produces the impression of an enormous current of nebulous matter rushing spirally into the flames of this distant sun, as if it were the fuel that feeds them. In some respects it recalls the appearance of the radiating streamers and banners of light that are seen surrounding our own sun during a total eclipse, but of course its actual magnitude is incomparably greater than that of the solar corona. Besides the great curving stream ending in the star, there is another part of the nebula more distinct and irregular which seems to be composed of flocculent masses and interrupted and confused currents, resembling some portions of the great nebula in Orion.

The discovery of this nebula is doubly interesting because it has been known for many years that there was a mysterious object in the Pleiades which no telescope and no eye seemed to be able fully to grasp. As long ago as 1779 Jeaurat published a map of this star group, in which a nebula was represented. But astronomers long looked for the nebula in vain. In 1859 Tempel found a nebula in the Pleiades, but it was not in the position assigned by Jeaurat. Tempel's nebula was afterward seen by others, but it hardly ever appeared the same. Sometimes for years it could not be found at all, and it even seemed as though it was not fixed in position. The new nebula discovered in Paris does not occupy the place of Tempel's nebula, neither does it correspond to the nebula of Jeaurat. The latter was near the star Atlas, and Tempel's nebula appears to be connected with still another of these celebrated sister stars, Merope. That three of the Pleiades should be surrounded by a nebulous mass certainly adds strength to the hypothesis of Mitchel that the members of this beautiful group are linked together in a system by themselves, an assemblage of suns lying like an island group in space.

The most significant thing about the discovery of the Henrys is the promise it give as to the future importance of photography in exploring the heavens. The value of photographs of celestial phenomena in determining questions of form and location has long been recognized, but if this art is going to give new eyes to astronomers and enable them to detect in the heavens objects that the sense of sight alone cannot reach, then the application which is now being made of it at the Paris observatory is likely to prove the most important advance in astronomy since the spectroscope was applied to analyzing the sun and stars. The evidence of the existence of dark or invisible bodies in space in numbers formerly undreamed of is yearly accumulating. The labors of the Messrs. Henry show there is reason to hope that we shall yet get more than a mere glimpse of the hidden wonders of the heavens.—N. Y. Sun.

BIBLE STUDIES.—No. III.

Though by no means claiming an extensive acquaintance with modern languages, yet the effort to read the New Testament in some of these modern tongues of Europe has impelled us to notice some renderings that have impressed our own mind, and which, by way of variety in our paper, may prove interesting to our readers. In Jno. v. 39, we have the Greek phrase, Ἐραυνατε τας γραφας, rendered in our Authorized Version, Search the Scriptures. In the Vulgate, and in Beza's Latin New Testament we have, Scrutamini Scripturas, which would mean in English, Scrutinize the Scriptures. This rendering gives the sense of the Greek with something like precision. The Spanish Version gives, Escudrinad las Escrituras, in which the verb employed, escudrinar, means to pry into the meaning of the sacred writings. The French Version reads, Sondez les Escritures, which means, Sound or fathom the Scriptures; i. e., Go into their great depths of meaning. The Italian reads, Investigate le Scritture. The Italian verb, Investigare, has a similar meaning to the English verb investigate, but note, the imperative form is to be divided in-ves-ti-ga-te, into five syllables and accented on the fourth or penultimate. This verb, both in Italian and English, is derived from the Latin, investigo, which, in turn, is derived from vestigo, prefixed with the preposition in, and this simpler verb is from the noun vestigium which means a track made by a footstep.

The force of the word in all three languages, particularly in the Latin and Italian, will be felt when we get right down to the root meaning of vestigo, or as compounded, investigo. The root idea is that of a hound carefully tracing the track of some animal of which it is in pursuit, or hunting the footsteps of his master in order to follow him. The German reading, Sechet in der Schrift,—Search the Scriptures—is a little more intensive than the English, as it signifies, search into (the meaning of) the Scripture.* The Low Dutch or Holland Version reads, Onderzeekt de Schriften—Underseek the Scriptures, i. e., look deeply below the surface, penetrate into their profounder significancy. Compare this idea with the French—that of sounding or fathoming the word for its profounder meaning. The Swedish translation is, Ransaker Skrifterne, Ransack the Scriptures. For real force this seems the one emphatic word that embodies the force of all the others. In its etymology, its primary meaning is to plunder, pillage completely, as an army ransacks a house or city when plundering. In the general sense it means to search every place or part, to open parcels and turn everything inside out.

From all these renderings our readers will get the correct idea of "searching the Scriptures." Scrutinizing, prying into, fathoming the depths, minutely and intently tracing the meaning, as the faithful dog hunts out the footsteps; searching into microscopically, penetrating into and ransacking every part, are the separate expressions that, taken together, show the intense importance of Jesus' words. The acquisition of human learning is not to be attained without the most careful application of our mental powers. If the exact knowledge of earthly things is a difficult acquirement, how much more so the knowledge of heavenly things? In the one case our external senses aid us, in the other we must employ the innermost faculties. The earthly things are the seen and the temporal; the heavenly things are the unseen and the eternal. Search the Scriptures to know the latter.

*The real force of German words sometimes comes out best in the compounds. Thus the father meaning of the verb Sechen will be seen in the word zwe-fplat—searching-plate—a microscope. So are we to look into the recondite parts of scripture, as we make our researches into nature, with a "microscopic care. The preposition gives the verb additional force—"search into."

JEWISH NOTES.

The Pasha of Palestine called a meeting of prominent citizens of Jerusalem for contributions to mobilize the Turkish army. The Jewish community was represented by rabbi Elijah Nahon, and the Jews contributed very liberally.

In the early part of the present month eight additional houses were dedicated which the Society Ezrath Nidachim has erected for the Yemen refugees on the side of Mount Olive, in Jerusalem. Nineteen of these families still dwell on the premises of the Talmud Torah of the Sephardim Community.

The total amount of money collected in Germany by Rabbi Nathan Bamberger toward building a new hospital in Jerusalem is 41,520 marks. The money is at present invested in Turkish Government stock.

The St. Petersburg Jewish Society for Promoting Knowledge has elected as its president M. Samuel Polikoff, the celebrated "Railway King."

The legislature of Finland has received petitions in large numbers for the admission of the Jews to equal rights. The press also speaks very favorably in behalf of the plea, as, by the testimony of the governor of Finland, the relations between the Christians and the Jews are very satisfactory.

The inauguration of a synagogue in the province of Tulishin, in Russia, was an occasion of great interest on account of its remarkable history. Four years ago, Count Potorki, a great feudal land-owner, desirous of marking his goodwill to his Hebrew vassals, laid the foundation of this building, but died very soon afterwards, and his successor refused to complete it. A few weeks ago, through the action of a well-to-do member of the community, Count Potorki's memorial edifice was completed, and the opening of it inaugurated with great pomp and solemnity. It is probably the only instance on record of the indebtedness of Jews to a Christian donor for a place of worship, and Count Potorki, for his liberal sentiments and noble intention of benefiting his Jewish employes, ought to be enrolled in the list of illustrious Poles who have befriended the long-time friendless Jews in Polish Russia.

The Jewish community at Adrianople have appointed a committee to collect money as a patriotic contribution towards the maintenance of the military stationed in the town, and have already contributed thirty artillery horses.

An exhibition is to be held at Liverpool during the present year, opening in May next, and it is proposed to send as exhibits a variety of articles manufactured in the workshops of the Baron Lionel Rothschild School in Jerusalem. The exhibits will include locks and keys such as are used in Jerusalem, as also different specimens in use in England, iron bedsteads, hammers, candlesticks, pipes, boots, shoes and slippers, bedding, Eastern costumes, fittings for modern divans, models in clay and plaster, drawings and sketches. The manufacture of articles in olive wood has been prohibited by the local authorities in Jerusalem.

Twenty Roumanian families started for Kansas on Monday, March 8, to settle in the neighborhood of Lasker. The colony will bear the name of "Gilead." Another party of seventeen Russian families passed through New York on Tuesday, March 9, for the same destination, and others are to follow. Some of the colonists have already selected land in Barbour County, Kansas.—The Occident.

The Book of Jobab, called Job, Son of Zare, Son of Hraguel, Son of Hesau, Son of Isaac, Son of Habraam. — According to the Septuagint.

CHAP. VI.

1. And Job taking up the discourse saith:

2. Would that some one might stay my wrath, and at the same time weigh my woes in a balance.

3. They would be heavier even than the sand of the sea-shore. But as it seems my words are of no avail.

4. For the arrows of the Lord are in my body; their anger drinketh up my blood; when I begin to speak they pierce me.

5. What forsooth! Will the wild ass cry for naught except when seeking his food? And will an ox bellow over his manger when he hath provender?

6. Shall food be eaten without salt? and is there relish in empty words?

7. Yea my wrath cannot rest. For I see something to eat, my food; like the lion's scent do I see it.

8. O that my request might be granted, that it might come to pass, and that [illegible] might grant my hope!

9. That [illegible] hath begun, [illegible] may he not [illegible] my city be my burial-place, for which I have mounted walls; for it I will not spare myself. For I have not falsified my God's sanctified words.

11. What indeed is my strength that I should endure, or what is my time that I should hold out?

12. Is my strength the strength of stones, or is my flesh brazen flesh?

13. Have I not trusted in him? But responsive help standeth away from me.

14. Mercy hath been denied me and the Lord's visitation hath overlooked me.

15. My nearest give me no attention. As the spring torrent falleth, or like a wave have they passed me by.

16. Those who constantly respected me, like snow or the frozen hail have fallen upon me;

17. Even as it melted when the summer heat hath come, what I was hath not been recognized;

18. In this wise have I also been left behind by all, am lost forsooth and have become an outcast.

19. Ye have seen the ways of the Thamanites, ye who discern the unchanging ways of the Sabeans;

20. And a debt of shame will those who trust in cities and material things incur;

21. But nevertheless ye also come unto me without mercy, that having seen my wound ye may fear.

22. Why forsooth? Have I invited you at all? Or have I besought strength of you,

23. To save me from enemies, or to deliver me out of the hand of mighty ones?

24. Teach me and I will be dumb. If I have erred in any respect show me.

25. But as it would seem, words of truthful statement are of no effect; not from you forsooth do I seek strength;

26. Nor will your reproof cause my words to cease; no, nor will I refrain from utterance at your word.

27. Surely ye are falling upon an orphan and leaping upon your friend.

29. But now I've looked into your faces I will not lie.

29. Sit down and be not unjust, and come together again in the just way.

30. For there is no wrong-doing in my tongue. Surely doth not my throat practice understanding?

CHAP. VII.

1. Is or is not man's lifetime upon the earth a time of trial, and his life as it were the life of a hireling by the day?

2. Or is he a courtier as it were who standeth in awe of his lord and sheweth a shadow? Or a hireling who waiteth for his wages?

3. In this wise have I waited also months in vain, and nights of woe have been given me.

4. If I lie down to sleep I say, when will it be day? And whenever I arise, when will it be evening again? And I have come to be full of woe from evening until morning.

5. My body walloweth in the corruption of worms, and I waste away as I scrape off clods of earth with exuding matter.

6. My living is of less moment than passing talk and hath been lost in vain hope.

7. Remember therefore that my life is a breath, and that my eye will never again return to see good.

8. The eye of him who seeth me will never again observe me; thine eyes are upon me and I am no more.

9. Like a cloud as it were that hath cleared away from off the heavens. For if a man go down to hades, he may never again come up,

10. Nor ever again return to his own house, nor shall his place ever again know him.

11. Nevertheless I will not be sparing with my mouth; though in a strait I will talk; though constrained I will bring forth the bitterness of my soul.

12. Am I a sea or a dragon that thou hast set a watch over me?

13. I said my couch should comfort me, and I will bring to myself my own word on my couch.

14. Thou terrifiest me with dreams and in visions dost thou perplex me.

15. Thou wilt divorce my soul (organic life) from my breath and my bones from death.

16. For I may not live forever to show forth long-suffering. Stand away from me. For my living is a thing of vanity.

17. Yea, what is man that thou hast magnified him, or that thou dost give thy mind to him?

18. Or that thou shouldst visit him until the morning and assign him rest?

19. How long art thou going to allow me, not even until the morning, me? not even until I swallow down my spittle?

20. If I have sinned, what shall I be able to do about it, O thou who knowest full well the mind of man? By what means hast thou appointed me to attain unto thee? and am I a burden upon thee?

21. By what means shall I bring about a forgetfulness of my transgression and a purification from my sin? Right soon shall I go away into the earth and when the morning dawneth I shall be no more.

CHAS. GARDNER.

Notes by the Way.

I left Danville, Ill., Feb. 18, and arrived in Lanark, the 19th. Went to Plum River the 20th and commenced meeting the same evening, which I continued until Thursday night. During this meeting we baptized five willing souls into the Anointed for the remission of sins. We then went to the Union church, a distance of about three miles, where we commenced meeting Friday night and held till Friday. Here the storm interferred with our meeting but there was a good interest shown and quite a number will soon become obedient. I have now stopped meeting to take a little rest. We shall rest till Friday night, when we will commence again at Browntown, Wis. Yours in hope,

J. T. WHITSETT.

I see by the tag on my paper that the time of renewing my subscription is past due, and as we think we could hardly keep house without it, enclosed please find two dollars to apply on the same. Would like to write a few lines if it doesn't infringe too much on good material. In my earlier life I was connected with the Disciples here in Richland County, Wisconsin. Just after the war went to southeastern Kansas and through the preaching of our old beloved Brother Gower, who now sleeps in Jesus Christ down in Texas, I saw the way of life more perfect, and then listening to the words of eternal life as they fell from the lips of Brother Foore, how could I but believe in eternal life only through Jesus Christ, and the establishment of the kingdom on the earth, and so many other truths taught in God's word. And now I am back to my old home. Some here wonder how I can hold my position as elder in the church expressing my views as I do, but the word of God told in its simplicity will win the hearts of those who will listen, and some of them are inclining their ear, and if any of our preaching brethren come this way don't fail to give us a call. Yours for the truth,

Who is the Criminal?

A ragged, shivering little boy was brought before a magistrate for stealing a loaf of bread from a grocer's window. The judge was about to pass sentence on the little wretch, when a kind lawyer offered the following considerations in mitigation of his offence:

"The child," he said, "is the eldest of a miserable group. Their mother is an incorrigible sot; their father lies low in the drunkard's grave. This morning, when the act was committed, the mother lay drunk upon the floor, and her children were crying around her for bread. The elder boy, unable to bear such misery any longer, rushed from the hovel, resolved to obey that paramount law of nature which teaches us the principle of self-preservation, even in disregard of the law of the land. He seized the penny loaf from the grocer's window, and returned to that wretched home, spread the unexpected morsel before his hungry brothers, and bade them 'eat and live.' He did not eat himself. No. Consciousness of the crime, and fears of detection, furnished a more engrossing feeling than that of hunger. The last morsel was scarcely swallowed before an officer of justice entered the door. The little thief was pointed out by the grocer, and he was conducted before the public tribunal. In the midst of such misery as this, with the motive of this little criminal before us, there is something to soften the heart of man, though I deny not that the act is a penal offense.

"But the tale is by no means told. This little circle, now utterly fallen and forlorn, is the wreck of a family once prosperous, temperate, frugal, industrious and happy. The father, strange as it may appear, was once a professor of religion. The very first drop of that accursed tincture of destruction which conducted him through the path of corruption to the grave, was handed to him by this grocer, who now pursues the starving child of his former victim for stealing a penny loaf. The farm became encumbered; the community turned its back upon the miserable victim of intemperance; the church expelled him from the communion; the wife sought in the same tremendous remedy for all distracting care, an oblivion of her domestic misery. Home became a hell, whose only outlet was the grave.

"All this aggregate of human wretchedness was [illegible] solely grocer. He has murdered [illegible] ther, he has brutalized the [illegible], has beggared the children; he has taken possession of the farm, and now prosecutes the child for stealing a loaf to keep his brothers from starving!

"But all this is lawful and right; that is, it is according to law. He has stood upon his license. The theft of a loaf by a starving boy, where his father laid down his last farthing for rum, is a penal offense!"

MANTON, Mich.

Editor Restitution:

THE RESTITUTION is all the gospel preaching we have in Manton. I love its teachings; it has been a great help to me in searching the Scriptures. I thank our blessed Lord for his holy word. I feel to praise his name this beautiful morning for the many blessings he is bestowing on me from day to day. I am very poor in this world's goods but I am rich in faith. This blessed gospel has been a great comfort to myself and family. We are striving to live so that we may have a part in the first resurrection and a crown of eternal life. In August, 1884, I was paralyzed. I could not move hand or foot and nearly lost my speech. My doctors, for I had three, told my family they did not think it possible for me to live, but I did live, bless his holy name. Today I can get around quite comfortably, but am not able to do any hard labor. But thank God there are better days coming for those that are found watching and waiting for our blessed Savior. Then there will be no more sickness, no more pain, no more sorrow. My prayer is, come Lord Jesus, come quickly. Your brother in Christ, H. EGLEY.

Corrections.

In my article in issue of Feb. 24, 1886, in second column near the middle is given Rev. xxi. 16 instead of Proverbs xxi. 16. In the last half of same column Job xxx. instead of Job xix. 26, and farther down same column Psa. xxii. instead of Psa. xvii. 15. These mistakes will tend to mislead if not corrected. ## BEYOND.

Beyond life's toils and cares,
Its copes and joy, its weariness and sorrow,
Its sleepless nights, its days of smiles and tears,
One bright, unending morrow.

Beyond time's troubled stream,
Beyond the chilling waves of death's dark river,
Beyond life's lowering clouds and fitful gleams,
Its dark realities and brighter dreams,
A beautiful forever.

No aching hearts are there,
No tear-dimmed eye, no form of sickness wasted.
No cheek grown pale through penury or care,
No spirits crushed beneath the woes they bear,
No sighs for bliss untasted.

No sad farewell is heard,
No lonely wail of loving one departed,
No dark remorse is there o'er memories stirred,
No smile of scorn, no harsh or cruel word
To grieve the broken-hearted.

No long, dark night is there,
No light from sun or silvery moon is given,
But Christ, the Lamb of God, all bright and fair,
Illumes the city with effulgence rare,
The glorious light of Heaven!

No mortal eye hath seen
The glories of that land beyond the river,
Its crystal lakes, its fields of living green,
Its fadeless flowers and the unchanging sheen,
Around the throne for ever.

Man hath not heard the song
Of rapturous praise within the shining portal;
No heart of man hath dreamed what joys belong
To that redeemed and happy blood-washed throng,
All glorious and immortal.

THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM.
No. 8.

Another text often quoted in support of a present phase of the kingdom of God is Col. i. 13, last clause. The whole passage reads, "Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son." Great stress is laid on the word "HATH"—HATH translated us into the kingdom. The phrase "hath translated" is in the perfect tense in our English version, but the original word is not in the perfect tense of the Greek. There are two other verbs in this verse, also rendered by the perfect tense in the English version, namely, "hath made meet," and "hath delivered." All these verbs are in what is known in the Greek as the AORIST tense.

I request the special attention of the reader to this point, although it may appear dry and uninteresting to an ordinary reader. But as the translators had in their minds the popular idea of a present kingdom, they would naturally give such a rendering to any word as would harmonize with that idea, if such word would admit of it. It so happens that the Aorist tense is capable of a rendering which would harmonize equally well with the idea of a future kingdom, and therefore demands our closest scrutiny.

Observe, then, that the Aorist tense is, in regard to the TIME of any given action, indefinite; that is, the use of it does not of itself determine whether the action is past, present or future. This may be seen from the meaning of the word Aorist itself. It is a compound of "orizo" I limit, and "a" privative, and signifies without limit, or unlimited. This is to be found in any Greek lexicon. Dunbar defines the word Aorist thus: "Indeterminate, undefined, vague, loose, indefinite, (a tense in grammar) unlimited." In Liddell and Scott's Lexicon it is thus defined: "Without boundaries, unsettled, indefinite, indeterminate." "II. ho aoristos (sc. chronos) the aorist. Gramm." The contraction ao. being for ceilicet—that is to say, and with chronos, added—is—that is to say Time.

This definition finds ample corroboration in the writings of Greek scholars. Dr. Moses Stuart, Andover College, United States, in the introduction to his Commentary on the Apocalypse, page 197, says, "Homer, Plato, Euripides, Demosthenes and others, employ the Aorist (and also the Perfect) to designate with intensity the certainty of future events. Kuhner has given abundance of examples to illustrate this, §443, 3. The Aorist is even more intensive than the Perfect for this purpose, inasmuch as it denotes completed action in distinction from continuance, which the Perfect more appropriately attaches to itself as an ad-signification. Virtually do we find the same use of the Aorist in John xiii. 31; xv, 6-8. Whatever difficulty may have existed among critics in time past with respect to such usage, it would seem that there is now no more occasion for them."

I here give the words of the passages named by Dr. Stuart: "Therefore, when he was gone out, Jesus said, Now is the Son of man glorified, and God is glorified in him." The terms "glorified" are in the Aorist tense, and Jesus not having at the time reached the lowest point of his humiliation shows the absolute futurity of the statement. This is confirmed by the next verse, "If God be glorified in him, God shall also glorify him in himself, and shall straightway glorify him." The same remarks apply to the other passage, "If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them and cast them into the fire and they are burned. If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you. Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit: so shall ye be my disciples."

Many other illustrations might be given, but I only quote from the song of Mary in which will be found several clear instances. I have marked the Aorist tense in small capitals:

"He HATH SHEWED strength with his arm; he HATH SCATTERED the proud in the imagination of their hearts.

"He HATH PUT down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree.

"He HATH FILLED the hungry with good things; and the rich he HATH SENT empty away.

"He HATH HOLPEN his servant Israel, in remembrance of his mercy." Luke i. 52-54.

In addition to the foregoing the authority of Professor Alexander might be quoted. In his "Elements of Greek Grammar," (page 115), treating of the Aorist tense, he says it is employed "in speaking of a contingent action which it is wished should be done and concluded, and which the mind naturally conceives and therefore expresses under this particular view."

Now let the principle contained in these quotations to the passage in Colossians and observe how it will operate. Dr. Stuart says, "The Aorist is used to designate with intensity the certainty of future events;" while Professor Alexander says it is employed "in speaking of a contingent action which it is wished should be done and concluded." The translation of the faithful disciples of Christ into the kingdom of God's dear Son is that "future event" and that "contingent action." Its certainty and its desirableness will be admitted by all, but the question now is, can this text, after these considerations, be quoted to prove the present existence of that kingdom, and the actual translation of the faithful into it? I hardly imagine that any one will rest such momentous propositions on such inferential grounds.

But not only is a different rendering of the verb in this passage possible, it is absolutely indispensable to the correct understanding of the apostle's meaning. By the Common Version he is made to affirm at least one thing which could not be predicted of any of the disciples at Colosse to whom he was writing, or even of himself at the time. That is that they and he "had been made meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light." Who will affirm that meetness for the inheritance, in its "glory and honor and immortality" (incorruptibility) can be truly predicted of any one while still in the present mortal condition? Is it moral (that is, spiritual) meetness that is intended? That kind of meetness is progressive throughout the present life, as we have it expressed in the language of this same apostle, "perfecting holiness in the fear of God." Is it physical meetness that is meant? That is attained only in the "spiritual body," for "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God."

So self-evident is this that Dr. James Macnight, in his translation of the epistles, recognized the necessity of rendering the first of the three verbs in the passage in the Present tense instead of the Aorist. The English Present has practically the effect of the Aorist in leaving the question of time indefinite. His rendering is, "who maketh us meet to be partakers of the inheritance."

There can be no doubt that, if Dr. Macnight had had his ideas of the kingdom founded on the teaching of the Scriptures, he would have seen the same propriety in rendering the other two verbs also in the Present, and so have presented a fair equivalent for the Greek Aorist. The whole passage would then consistently have read, "Giving thanks to the Father who maketh us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light, and who delivers us from the power of darkness, and translates us into the kingdom of his dear Son."

The clause "hath delivered us from the power of darkness," is liable to the same objection as I have made to the clause "hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance." What is the power of darkness? Our Lord said to the chief priests and captains of the temple and the elders who came to take him, "This is your hour and the power of darkness." Luke xxii. 53. He was not delivered from this power till he was raised up by the power of God from the grave. Evidently with reference to this power he said, "Now is my soul troubled; what shall I say? Father save me from this hour; but for this cause came I unto this hour." And again, "O my Father, if it be possible let this cup pass from me; nevertheless not as I will but as thou wilt." The chief priests and captains of the temple and the elders wielded the power of darkness in the case of our Lord, and we might safely conclude that parties occupying a similar position exercised this power over his disciples when Paul wrote his letter to the Colossians. We read that the same apostle wrote to the Ephesians about the same date, and his words to them were. "We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the RULERS OF THE DARKNESS OF THIS WORLD, against spiritual wickedness in high places." Eph. vi. 12. From this it is evident that "the power of darkness" was still rampant, and that the disciples were not as a matter of fact delivered from it. On the contrary they had to wrestle against it with the utmost diligence, armed with breastplate, shield and sword.

I submit this is another conclusive reason for extending Dr. Macnight's rendering as I have suggested, to all the three in the passage.

I observe an instance of the Aorist tense in another passage where it has been rendered in the manner I have advocated by the translators of the Revised Version. In 1 Thess. i. 10, it reads, "And to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, even Jesus who DELIVERED us from the wrath to come." Instead of giving us the Past tense "delivered," the revisers inserted the Present "delivers." The futurity of the event is here so plainly expressed—"the wrath to come,"—that they must have felt constrained to make the alteration. And if they had held the Scripture truth of the kingdom to come, they would doubtless have made a similar change in Col. i. 13.

It is evident from what has been said that where words and tenses are capable of shades of meaning even to the extent of expressing the past, the present or the future, it is absolutely indispensable to a fair translation that those undertaking such an important work should possess a correct knowledge of the fundamental elements of the subject treated in the work to be translated. It is a lamentable fact that the translators of the Bible have not possessed this knowledge, and that in regard to some of the most vital subjects of Bible revelation, especially in relation to the kingdom of God and everlasting life. Hence arises the necessity of Bible students making their own translations, necessarily leading to elaborate discussion on a thousand points in which the authorized translation is defective. This remark I submit is amply justified by the passage we have been considering. In again stating that this passage gives no support to the idea of a present kingdom in any of the senses we have mentioned in a previous article, I conclude this paper by pointing out the danger of resting important propositions on merely inferential reasonings. The fact is that it is nowhere in the Bible declared in plain words that the church is the kingdom, or that the kingdom is located in the heart of the believer as a principle, nor yet that there is a present kingdom of grace. Such ideas have nothing to rest on but inferences drawn from uncertain data which of themselves do not express the ideas founded on them.

Life from the Dead.

"What shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead?" When the beloved apostle wrote these words I suppose he had in mind the vision of dry bones. Not decomposed but disorganized parts of a previous living organization. The reorganization is a process not instantaneous as the resurrection of believers. The high priest said one man should die for that nation. This he spoke not of himself, but prophesied that Jesus should die for the nation that the nation should not perish. Perhaps the noise and shaking has come; that battalion of Jews which for the first time in modern history have entered into the conflict of the nations, may be the commencement of bone coming together to its bone; a perfect outward organization follows before life and vitality commence. ## OUR HOPE.

All light comes from the East; from thence the natural sun emerges in sovereign splendor to glorify the visible, and quicken all productive forces, and in that quarter the Sun of Righteousness arose with healing in his wings. In the fulness of the time God sent forth his Son to accomplish human redemption. The day-spring from on high visited those who were sitting in darkness and the shadow of death. He came to destroy him that had the power of death, and to deliver them who through the fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage. It was said to a great ambassador, in a memorable passage, "Rise and stand upon thy feet, for I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness, both of those things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee. Delivering thee from the people and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee. To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness unto light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive remission of sins, and an inheritance among them that are sanctified by faith in Me." There certainly never was such a life on earth as the life of Jesus. In the charm of perfect holiness, in the majesty of power and the infinity of love, he walked through the Holy Land, all shapes of anguish and distemper fleeing before him. The fountains of love which had been sealed began to flow, and great waves of life fell in music on each blessed shore.

2. The Master in the beginning of his work sent both the twelve and the seventy upon an urgent mission. With the force of supernatural energy behind them, they had one cry—the kingdom of God is at hand. In no cities of the Gentiles or Samaritans was the cry heard, but only among those who knew what the Kingdom of God signified in prophecy. In the midst of his working our Lord said—"If I by the finger of God cast out demons, no doubt the Kingdom of God is come nigh unto you." In verity it was nigh, for the King himself was present, and the great kingdom partially [illegible] of the world [illegible] a higher age [illegible] it one in full streams of [illegible] dence, moral and material. It is, however, certain that the message of life was not received; hence in parables and dark similitudes our Lord spake to the people, while his disciples alone were taught "The Mystery of the Kingdom." The Lord had a triumphal march at one period, but to correct those who thought that the kingdom of God would immediately appear, he taught them that the nobleman must journey into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return. No kingdom of God until the nobleman returns again; consequently no latter day of glory or triumph for truth, justice, and righteousness.

3. The hour and the power of darkness drew near, and in full prospect of the inconceivable anguish of that dreadful day, the Son of Man ministered gladness to his disciples by such teaching as this—"Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God—believe also in Me. In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also," John xiv. It should be as precious and as inspiring to us, and to all Christian humanity, as it was to the immediate disciples. It is manifest at once how the consolation differs from the doctrinal current of ages. The children have been all dreaming of passing into glory one by one, as if death were the gate of life. The teaching of the Master is of quite a different order—I will come again to you. The idea of a glorified spirit is a concept quite unknown to the New Testament, and, indeed, is as much an alien to reason as it is to revelation. Christianity deals not with ghosts, but with men—with man in his entireness as being composed of body, soul, and spirit: nor is one glorified before another. There is a great manifestation of the Sons of God—an adoption—a redemption of the collective body—and that is when he returns who is our life. The scientific view of the passage would be—that the universe is the house of God, and the mansions the orbs of light in the immense high dome which stretches away without measure. And doubtless God has many houses, and all of them built for eternity. But it is not the purpose of God to disperse and scatter the holy family through the universe, be the mansions ever so fine. As they form one body, with one pulse of life divine beating in them, it is in his plan and purpose to gather them all into one place. Unquestionably the house which the Lord went to prepare is the house circumstantially painted in the last two chapters of the book of Revelation. The same God who built for natural man a fine house, with granite foundations, and lighted all the lamps in the dark roof, builds for supernatural man a house still nobler, needing no outside luminary: no sun, or moon, or star shines there, for all the light cometh from the face of God. The foundations are precious stones, the gates are pearl, the streets are transparent gold, the tree of life blooms again, the river of life runs from the central throne, and so profound is the sanctity reigning that no temple is visible in the home of glory. Such is the house which Jesus went to prepare—the Jerusalem above, which is the Mother of us all, as the place from which all nourishing and lifegiving influences flow down in influence. When he comes to receive us to himself, he will bring the house with him as the metropolis of a new Creation, the central glory in an age of grand proportions. In that house, where neither pain nor grief, nor death nor darkness, can penetrate, there shall be blessedness unspeakable and perpetual.

4. It is not in evidence that the Prophets knew of two comings of the Lord, hence the sufferings of the Lord, and the glory which followed, seem to touch each other in their graphic pages. We Christian men can find two advents there, but our discovery is made by walking into the old Jewish house with Christian lamp in hand. The movement of God in history has given wider vision, and the landscape of eternity is distinguished in clearer outlines. The disciples thought that the kingdom of Prophecy would be restored in their own day, hence the tragedy of Calvary brought them confusion and despair; their human hope perished in sudden convulsion, and was buried in the grave of the Master. But the pall was lifted—"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again to a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." But even with that ground of confidence, and spring of new life within them, how painful their feeling as they behold their Lord ascending into the heavens. The voice of power was needed which reached them in such clear accents of realism—"Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven; this same Jesus who is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." It seems the right place for stating that those who talk and write about many comings of the Lord are—though it may be unconsciously—simply doing a work of confusion and disorganization, by which men lose their hold on organic truth, and are turned aside to fables. The Lord no more came at the destruction of Jerusalem than he came at the bombardment of Paris, or the battle of Sedan, nor does he come when a person dies, as some foolish men are in the habit of teaching. There are only two comings of the Lord—one in the past, the other in the future. "Once in the end of the world (completion of the ages) did he appear to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself....and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation."

5. Redemption by the blood of sacrifice being already accomplished, and the ancient Churches resting in the profound peace of reconciliation, the subject naturally took the second place in Epistles written to the Churches by inspired men. The thing which then became more impressive, arising from the situation, was the grand hope of life and incorruptibility. It has more than double the prominence of the atonement. That subject which towers above all as a great Jasper column, as the hope of ransomed humanity, is the transcendent glory of his appearing, to gather his holy people into the City of God. Indeed, it is that fine flame which gives glow and richness to the documents of inspiration. They are all colored through and through with the effulgence of that hope which is imperishable and divinely fair. The people of the olden time turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God, and wait for his Son from heaven. The Corinthians had their standing of this order—they came behind in no gift waiting for his appearing. "Our citizenship is in heaven, from whence we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who will change the body of our humiliation, and fashion it like unto his glorious body, according to the energy of his power." One valiant man knew that there was a crown reserved for him, which the Lord would give at that day—"And not to me only, but to all them also who love his appearing." Another said—"Now are we the sons of God, and we know not what we shall be: but we know that when he appeareth we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." It was said to a young evangelist by the Apostle Paul—"For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men. Teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world. Looking for the blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ." These are samples; such golden stars burn and shine through the whole New Testament. Our life is verily hidden with Christ in God, but when he who is our life shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory.

6. This seems the right place for calling the attention of the faithful to a phase of the question which is of deep moment to all who desire to be without guile before our Lord Jesus Christ. We have before us a most solemn class of passages, of which the following are examples:—"Watch ye therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come; therefore be ye always ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh," Matt. xxiv. 42-44; "Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of Man cometh," Matt. xxv. 13; "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief. Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day. We are not of the night nor of darkness. Therefore let us not sleep, as do others, but let us watch and be sober," 1 Thess. v. 4-6. Believing that the end of all things was at hand, the ancient brethren were sober, watching unto prayer. We affirm without hesitation that the theory of those who propose a post-millennial advent, empties these grand passages of all honest meaning. The people who believe that our Lord may appear in person this day, or midnight, or morning, are the only people with whom the passages have any significance; if they believe, they will be as pilgrims, whose loins are girded, and whose lamps are burning. As they march through the wilderness toward a finer country than Palestine, by day and by night, they look for the periect sunrise of the Orient, they expect to find the skies flooded with purple and gold in the glory of his appearing, and to hear that seventh trumpet, the trumpet of life, which awakens the children of the resurrection. Now these passages, which on the natural view have such power and inspiration in them, which ought to stir the blood as a sound of a trumpet by night, and quicken hope to spread out her immortal wings, are to our opponents mere curiosities of the antique, the mournful relics of some lapsed dispensation, looking as wan as Ossian's ghosts in the moonlight. It is, indeed, impossible for men, who expect first a converted world, and after a thousand years of latter-day glory, without the King's presence, to be watching for the return of the Lord. We could not take that down, with ever so many grains of salt; it would be as easy to swallow transubstantiation, or the immortality of the Grand Llama of Thibet. In order to meet the difficulty, such devices of Jesuitry have been resorted to, that we are almost ashamed to mention them. Among others it has been affirmed that death is substantially to each man the coming of the Lord; and when men begin to look for death in the room of looking for life, there is an end of all healthy religion, and there is a beginning of that disease during which fleshless spectres take the place of divine realities, all things looking sickly and discolored.

To us, who cleave unto the ancient hope, these solemn passages are no body of dust and ashes, they have lost none of their force and fire, and no life or blood has been drained away from them. Before we sleep, or in the midst of our rest, the heavens may be all on flame with the splendor of his revelation; hence that stands next to us; we are watching, waiting, and praying for the glory of his appearing.

7. The two classes of Christian men who are looking for a reign of justice and glory are curiously differentiated. By a sort of common consent the matter stands thus—those who believe in a spiritual reign; those who believe in personal reign. The distinction evinces much looseness of thought. The reign of our Lord will be both personal and spiritual. If his presence destroyed the spirituality of his reign, then his reign in the heaven of heavens, supposing that he gathered his people there, would fall in spirituality, because he was present as the central glory. But most likely, when the distinction was made the concept was—literal or figurative—will the Lord be actually present in person, or in the power of the Spirit and the prevalence of truth and righteousness? This is probable, because we know that to spiritualize a passage in modern jargon, simply consists in draining away the blood and life of some clear statement, leaving only smoke and ashes. When the substantial body of a passage has been destroyed by violence, the vapor which remains is called the spiritual meaning. Swedenborg only aggravated and intensified a prevailing disease when he led the "children of the mist" into deeper glooms, until the whole of the king's country seemed covered with contaminating steam.

The Word of God contains not a single promise of better times, save in connection with the second coming of the Lord. The ordinary view which men hold so loosely, of making a millennium by converting the world, is not only an alien to the word of inspiration, but is equally unknown to patristic times, the middle-age times, and to the times of the Lutheran Reformation. As a proof, take the well-known facts that on six or seven occasions, when famine, pestilence, and war were mowing down the human race, and strange portents were abroad on the earth and in the sky, the cry arose that the Lord was coming. There never was a doctor, patristic, mediæval, or Lutheran to arise and say—"That cannot be, for a converted world and latter-day glory must come before the Lord comes." In fact, I do not think that the theory can be traced further back than the days of Dr. Whitby. But wherever the theory came from of a Millennium without the binding of the devil, without the presence of the Lord, and the resurrection of his people, it is wholly false and evil. Whether it fell down, like Diana from Jupiter, or rose up from beneath, like some infernal god, it is a monster, and the sooner it be strangled or smothered, all the better for the health and peace of humanity.—From the "Golden Age, in the Fulness of the Time," by G. Greenwell, Adelaide, S. A.

BY-AND-BY.

There will be no sin or pain
By-and-by;
All that's dark will be made plain,
By-and-by;
For the Lord will come again,
Oh, how glorious is His reign,
Like the sprouting after rain,
By-and-by.

When life's lesson we shall learn,
By-and-by;
Jesus' voice we shall discern,
By-and-by;
He will banish every sigh,
Let us lift our hearts on high,
Our redemption draweth nigh,
By-and-by.

We shall meet Him eye to eye,
By-and-by;
We shall meet Him in the sky,
By-and-by;
We shall hear His tender tone,
We shall be no more alone,
He is coming to His own,
By-and-by.

NOTES ON ANASTASIS.—NO. 8.

Page 16. The author continues: "The consummation of the judgment of Christ's house, indicates the epoch of the third and last stage in the raising process. This crisis is the quickening by which resurrection is perfected." He has not given one text to prove either the first or second stages of resurrection, and he leaves the third stage also in the same unproved condition. He attempts to show an analogy between mortal gestation and what he terms spiritual gestation. It seems necessary to give here rather lengthy extracts, that the theory of "mortal emergence" may be better understood.

"This crisis (the third) is the quickening by which resurrection is perfected. The analogy is found in nature from which its Divine Creator selects many processes and principles, which he employs as figures to illustrate his teachings in the word. Thus in regard to corporeal generation in the process of developing an immortal being from the dust of sheol, the terms expressive of the stages of what may be styled spiritual gestation are conformed to the phenomena pertaining to the natural. The same fact obtains in relation to moral regeneration which must precede in probation the corporeal in the resurrection state."

Surely the words of Elihu unto Job in his affliction would seem quite in place here. Job xxxv. 16. "Therefore doth Job open his mouth in vain; he multiplyeth words without knowledge." They are vain speculations seeking to be wise above what is written. We are not told of any corporeal or physical body in the resurrection state. Nor of any process of gestation in the dust of sheol. If so, what is the book, and what the chapter and verse where such a thought is presented in the whole range of Scripture? In this life we have corporeal, i. e, physical bodies. We bear the image of the first Adam. In the resurrection state we have spirit bodies. We know not yet what we shall be, only that when he shall appear we shall be like him. This was enough to satisfy Paul while here in this mortal state. But the author of Anastasis in his anxiety to present something new, seems to have entirely lost sight of the present life; and places the similitude to both the first and second Adam, after the resurrection. If this be indeed so, whose image do we bear during this life? We are not told in the word that we will ever be restored to the image of the first Adam.

But he continues: "The moral process, 'the new man' is begotten or conceived, when the sinner perceives the truth as it is in Jesus' and he is quickened into new and independent life, when the truth works in him to will and do the good pleasure of Deity."

If he stop short of the quickening in moral or incorporeal gestation, he is a mere abortion; but if in the moral, the process is matured in a faith that works by love and purifies the heart; the immersed believer is addressed in these words: "And you hath he quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins (page 17) * * he hath quickened you together with Christ." Eph. ii. 1–5.

The immersed believer is surely quickened, by a knowledge of the truth. This quickening is the bringing of the mind or understanding into a knowledge of the truth, the written word, that we may be enabled through the knowledge thus acquired to live after the Spirit—the teaching of the Spirit in that word—and not after the lusts of the flesh, and as a result of this quickening we will in due time be resurrected or born of the Spirit. Spirit bodies. This is the plain simple teaching of the word of life.

But the author seeks further to apply his analogy: "The moral gestatory order of development is in strict conformity with the law of nature. According to this, quickening usually occurs about eighteen weeks after conception. During this interval the bearer has no direct consciousness of the embryo forming within; but when quickening occurs the attention is strangely excited. Now the English law recognises the cause of the phenomenon of quickening to be the acquisition of a life, by which the foetus might live independant of its bearer." The English law is certainly not correct here, for the foetus when quickened is not able to sustain life independent of its bearer. At least such assertion is not recognized as a rule in medical science.

He continues: "This idea is probably correct, and certainly exact enough to illustrate the phenomenon of moral and corporeal generation of 'the new man,' which after Deity is created in righteousness, and holiness and truth."

This is altogether speculation. There is nothing in the Book that tells us we are, or will be, corporeally generated a second time. We are physically or corporeally generated, when we are begotten, conceived, quickened, and born into this life. This process is nowhere in the Book mentioned as being repeated. If so, we would like to know where!

He continues: "The matrix of the new being is the heart of the sinner. The word of the kingdom is the incorruptible seed sown in his heart. For some time he has no direct consciousness that a new being is forming within him."

This is but vague and unmeaning would-be philosophy! We all know that the fleshly heart is not an intellectual organ. Its work is to propel the vital fluid through the physical system. When the heart is mentioned in Scripture we know it refers to the mental faculties of our nature.

He goes on: "In process of time however his attention is strangely excited and carries within him, perceives that new ideas, aspirations and feelings, which before he began to read, and study the word, he was an entire stranger to. These are a new creation and if they do not prove abortive, will ultimate in the development of the incorruptible immortal man; for this new corporeal being is originally quickened in the heart of the Old Man. John vi. 63."

Before such statements as the foregoing can be accepted by intelligent men and women; reason must totter on her throne, or else the mind must have been brought to the same condition as the Roman Catholic's who when asked concerning his faith, simply replies: "I believe what the Church believes." Let me ask where in the word have we any intimation that there is a new corporeal being forming within us? Where are we told that an attribute of the mind—faith—is a new corporeal being? and that that being is quickened in the heart of the sinner? A corporeal being is a physical being. Such an object or obstruction introduced into the compartments of the heart, would at once impede the flow of the vital current, and by so doing produce death inevitably!

John vi. 63, reads: "It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing. The words that I have spoken unto you are spirit and are life." Here there is nothing said of a "new corporeal being." On the contrary we are told that the flesh—which is the corporeal body—profiteth nothing. We are begotten by the word of truth, and then our life—our future life is hid with Christ in God. He it is who holds our life; and when he who is our life shall appear; then shall we also appear with him in glory.

He still further says: "This is true, whether the quickening be moral or corporeal; in the former case, the quickening power is in divine ideas, of which the words are the signs; while in the latter the quickening power is what philosophers would term electrical."

On this confusion of ideas is based another proposition of "mortal emergence," viz: "According, therefore, to the analogy of nature, the second stage of the process of raising answers to the interval between the begettal or conception in the dust of sheol, and the quickening after judgment."

Here the author of Anastasis presents the thought that the second stage of the process of raising corresponds to the first eighteen weeks after conception; and that in this embryotic state the heirs to immortal life pass through a formal trial at the bar of judgment; and then, after they have been judged while in this embryotic condition, they are quickened. According to nature, which he so closely follows, they must remain a corresponding length of time in that undeveloped state, as the foetus is not capable of independent life till after it has been born.

He continues: "This interval is perceptible in the case of the last Adam. He was begotten in the tomb in fulfillment of the second Psalm—this day have I begotten thee." Acts xiii. 33.

This is a sad misapplication of prophecy, for the combined Scripture evidence on this point goes to show, that the prophet when speaking in Psa. ii., had in view the day when the mother of the only begotten One, was overshadowed by Holy Spirit, and she was told that "The holy thing which is begotten shall be called the Son of God." This is the only time the Christ is spoken of as having been begotten, and it is quite evident that Paul thoroughly understood this fact, and intelligently presented it to his hearers as recorded in Acts xiii. beginning at verse 17, when by invitation of the rulers of the synagogue at Antioch, he addressed them on fulfillment of prophecy regarding Christ. Please read the entire context.

In verse 33, he says, "And we bring you good tidings of the promise made unto the fathers, how that God hath fulfilled the same to our children in that he raised up Jesus, as also it is written in the second Psalm, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee."

Query: 'How was the promise made unto the fathers fulfilled to that generation, more than to any other? Because, in that generation Jesus was manifested, was raised up, was born—the Christ appeared—the Word became flesh, and the then living witnesses beheld his glory, the glory as of an only begotten One, full of truth and grace.

First, note the promise in Gen. iii. 15; xxii. 18; xxiv. 4; xlix. 10; Psa. lxxxix. 24–27. In Acts iii. 22, R. V., Peter refers to these and other prophecies when he says, "Moses indeed said, a prophet shall the Lord God raise up unto you from among your brethren, like as he raised up me." He did not resurrect Moses. He manifested him, having first miraculously cured for him, preserved his life till the time appointed for his manifestation. Paul did not quote the second Psalm to prove the resurrection of Christ, in Acts xiii. 33, but he does refer to that event in verse 34, when he says, "And as concerning that he raised him from the dead now no more to return to corruption, he hath spoken on this wise: I will give you the holy and sure blessings of David." The sure, or abiding blessings of David could not be [illegible] joyed in mortal life. Therefore Paul showed that Jesus was raised from the dead that the promise might be verified to him.

The third prophecy that Paul quotes in this discourse as having been fulfilled in the Christ is, "Thou wilt not give thine Holy One to see corruption." Psa. xvi. 10. Here it is plainly seen that Paul referred to these separate prophecies as having been fulfilled in the Christ. First, his manifestation as the only begotten of the Father. Second, as he who could claim the sure and abiding mercies of David, because of having been raised from the dead, and third, as the Holy One who was not to see corruption.

From these plain, Scriptural facts it cannot but be seen that it is a vain assumption to say that Christ was begotten in the dust of sheol. Yet the author of Anastasis continues, "But when Mary afterwards saw him in the garden, he had not been quickened, for he told her then not to touch him, because he had not yet ascended to his Father, who was his aid, strength or power. John xx. 17."

This is an assertion contradicting the plain testimony of the word. All must admit that to quicken is to make alive. If Jesus had not been quickened when he talked to Mary, then the angels who came and rolled away the stone and sat in the sepulchre, made a false statement, for they said, Luke xxiv. 4–7, "Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is not here, he is risen; remember how he spake unto you when he was yet in Galilee, saying, that the Son of man must be delivered up into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified and the third day rise again. Here the angels represent this action as having been completed in fulfillment of Jesus' own prophecy regarding himself. If he came not forth from the sepulchre to life immortal in the day of his resurrection, then indeed are the "Scriptures broken," which say he became the first fruits of them that slept; because others had been raised to mortal life through his instrumentality—and even before his advent did not the prophet Elijah call forth the widow's son from the death state to mortal life? We have no intimation that any others have ever been raised to immortality. Christ was the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming—not before.

But let me further quote the logic presented to try to sustain "mortal emergence." . . . . "But subsequently to this we find him in the midst of his disciples, when he breathed upon them Holy Spirit. When the breath of a man from the tomb is holy spirit, that man must have been corporeally quickened to have become spirit."

Are not these words without knowledge? What is it to be corporeally quickened, but to be made physically alive? A corporeal body is a physical body and nothing else. Our present bodies are our physical bodies. At, and after the resurrection, we will have spirit bodies, but not till then. But again I quote, "He came forth from the sepulchre so early that it was yet dark; and it was the same first day at even that he breathed upon them. Here was a day. Eight days after this he appeared among them and invited Thomas to touch him. He had given the same invitation to the rest eight days before when he declared that he was flesh and bones and not a phantasm as they supposed. Luke xxiv. 37–39." (Note the word phantasm is not the word of this text in the original, which word signifies an apparition, but the word "pneuma" is here given which signifies an attribute of the mind.) "Now somewhere between the dawn and the evening of the resurrection day, the cause for the interdict, 'Touch me not,' was removed; in other words, the ascent from the lower nature, begotten to incipient life in the tomb, to the Father who is spirit, John iv. 24, must have taken place."

In this quotation there must be noted by every careful reader of the word a strange bewilderment as to the "touch me not," and this interdict being removed by Jesus' ascent from a lower to a higher nature. As proof of this bewilderment read the account of the visit of the women to the sepulchre as given by Matt. xxviii. 1–10. When they were going from the sepulchre that very morning verse 9 reads, "And behold Jesus met them saying, All hail! And they came and took hold of his feet and worshipped him." This establishes the fact beyond dispute, that the "interdict" was only to Mary, and at that special moment, and why it was so we are not told and have no right to speculate on the subject.

John iv. 24, as quoted, has no reference to the subject in hand at all. It reads, "God is a Spirit and they that [illegible]hip him must worship him in [illegible]ruth." It merely shows

[illegible] should always

NOTICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS:

The book is truthful, reverent and instructive, every way worthy of the attention of those who prefer calm argument to sensational speculation.—The Rainbow.

We are desirous to express our sympathy with the general scope of the book, and to bespeak for it a wide and cordial reception.—The Messenger.

The volume before us is evidently the product of a thoughtful mind, and deserves the careful study of every Christian, being of a very comprehensive character, and based on Scripture. Certainly it is the best work on the subject which has come under our notice.—The Sydney Observer.

The treatment shows that the author has studied well and patiently digested his theme before writing upon it, and we feel as we read page after page, stimulated rather than clogged in our inquiry. . . . . The aim of the volume before us is to set the truth clearly before the mind, and so restore to its place in the consciousness of the church the hope that was once so dear to God's suffering saints, and is still so to many, but which is always unwelcome to a worldly, cold and formal church, and hated by the world. This little volume will be received and read with pleasure by all who take interest in prophetic subjects.—Rev. Nathaniel West, D. D.

THE COMING AGE,

—ITS—

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WESTHEAD.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the answers are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and ingenuity we see employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $1.00. Send to this office for this work.

THE TRUE CHARACTER OF THE PRESENT DISPENSATION.
Part II.

Passing on to the second division of our subject, viz., to prove that the dispensation under which we are now living is not only exceptional in point of time, but altogether peculiar in its character. It differs in every respect both from that which went before, and from that which is to follow. This will be seen in three important particulars, to which your earnest attention is now invited.

1. God has ever dealt with Israel nationally. As a nation they were brought in triumph out of Egypt; as a nation they were led and supported—alternately comforted and punished—in their wanderings for forty years through the Arabian desert; and as a nation they were settled in possession of the land of promise. The covenant with them was a national covenant; and their promises are, without exception, national promises. Thus it was ever with them, so long as they retained a distinct place and name. And so will it be with them hereafter, when the Divine counsels concerning them shall begin to be developed. As a nation they were called out of Egypt; as a nation they were dispersed in exile; and as a nation they will be reinstated in their own land when the appointed time for their restoration shall have come. For thus saith the prophet, "Who hath heard such a thing? who hath seen such things? Shall the earth be made to bring forth in one day? or shall a nation be born at once? for as soon as Zion travailed she brought forth her children?" Isa. lxvi. 8.

As a nation also they will be converted. For though some comparatively few of them have been previously turned to the Lord their God, it is not till they actually see the King in his glory that, as a people, their hearts will be truly given to him; as it is written, "I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and supplications; and they shall look upon me whom they have pierced: and they shall mourn for him as one that mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for him, as one that is in bitterness for his first-born," Zech. xii. 10.

Thus God has ever dwelt with Israel nationally, in all the varied phases of their past history; and this rule will not be departed from in the days which are yet to come.

The direct converse of this is the case as respects his dealings with the Gentiles. With us God deals not nationally, but individually. This is the most important point of all, the true key to the right understanding of our position as members of Christ's Church, before God and before the world. God is now "visiting the Gentiles"—not to convert them, but to "take out of them a people for his name;" that is, collecting individuals everywhere out of every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, who shall be to the praise and glory of his name.

But this people, so taken out, have no visible bond or outward mark whereby they may be known of men. They are not formed into a nation, or collected into a visible Church. Save in the bonds of the Spirit, sacred and invisible to us, they are not now united into one body; nor can they be infallibly discerned or recognised by men. "The Lord," and the Lord only, "knoweth them that are his.

During the whole long interval of this exceptional dispensation, no one nation ever yet has been, or now is, which answers to that of Israel, although England may, perhaps, present some features of resemblance. No one Church (and here is the grand error into which Gentile pride has fallen) ever yet has had the right to call itself "the Church of Christ;" neither Jerusalem, nor Antioch, nor Ephesus, nor Rome, nor Geneva, nor England, nor any other, in any place, or at any time. Individuals only are chosen; picked out, as it were, here and there from the various congregations of professing Christians. Few in number they are compared with the masses among whom they dwell; but a "multitude whom no man can number" will they prove to be in the glorious day of their manifestation. But that day has not yet come, and therefore the sons of God still remain invisible and unknow to all, save God alone.

Thus, it appears, the first characteristic of the present dispensation, as distinguished from that which went before, and that which is yet to come, is that the present dispensation is not national, but individual.

2. Again, God's dealings with Israel have ever been miraculous, and ever will be so. Their own past history has been one stupendous miracle from the exodus to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Roman armies; and of this fact no Bible-reader can be ignorant. Nay, the Jews (that is, the "dispersed of Judah") are even now a standing miracle; for what save a perpetual interposition of supernatural providences could have preserved them a separate people—so distinctly marked in feature, character, and habits, in everything, in fact, which can distinguish one people from another—though scattered over the whole face of the earth, persecuted, hunted like wild beasts, and sifted as corn is sifted, for eighteen centuries through all the nations of the world? Doubtless also the "outcasts of Israel," if we could discover their hiding-place, would afford similar evidence of miraculous preservation.

What has been hitherto shall be again. When the predicted work of restoration shall commence, the age of miracles shall be revived; and those miracles, we are told, shall be of a nature so astonishing as to eclipse all the wonderful events of their past history. For thus it is written, "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that they shall no more say, The Lord liveth, which brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt; but the Lord liveth, which brought up, and which led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country, and from all countries whither I had driven them; and they shall dwell in their own land," Jer. xxiii. 7, 8. So has it ever been, and so shall it be hereafter with respect to Israel. Signs and wonders and miracles surround them on every side, at every period of their eventful history, past, present, and to come.

But directly the opposite of this is the case as to the Gentiles under the present dispensation. Now, as respects them, all is quiet, silent, unperceived; the secret, heart-searching, mind-controlling, spirit-stirring operations are in ceaseless progress of that Spirit whose goings forth are like the "wind, which bloweth where it listeth, and men hear the sound thereof, but cannot tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth."

The corn-field will afford a simple and familiar illustration of this subject. The two busy seasons in its cultivation are the seed-time and the harvest. Look upon the field in the former season. It is full of laborers, some ploughing, some casting in the seed, some harrowing the furrows. But when these operations are ended, the husbandmen retire out of sight, and the field is left to itself. It is apparently quite deserted, although the careful owner fails not, from a distance, to keep an ever-watchful eye over it. The seed grows silently, the husbandman knows not how, nor cares to inquire; and for months together you may not see a living creature, nor movement, nor stir of any kind in that field.

But look again when the corn is fully ripe, and the fields are yellow for harvest, and once more you behold a scene of busiest labor. Men, women, and children are seen in crowds. All is bustling activity, reapers, binders, and gleaners treading on each other's footsteps. Ponderous wains, laden with the precious fruits of the earth, toil their slow way through the soft, rich soil, under the glad eye of the master, whilst songs of rejoicing and sounds of mirth are heard on all sides, from early morn to dewy eve.

Just so has it been, so it is now, and so will it be hereafter, during the economy under which we are now living. Its commencement was signalized by miracles, and signs, and wonders wrought by Christ and his Apostles. This answers to the seed-time in the corn-field. Then the field, i. e., the world, was left to itself, apparently deserted, and without open miracle or sign. Not that, in reality, miracles have ever ceased; for, to speak of nothing else, the conversion of each individual sinner is a miracle of Divine grace. But during the whole of that long interval, extending over well-nigh 1800 years, there has been no visible token of the Divine presence, no sensible display of God's power such as to command the attention of all, as did the miracles of Christ and his Apostles. In other words, the miraculous ceased to be the rule, and became the exception.

But when the spiritual corn, intended for the granaries of heaven, is fully ripe, the scene shall then once more be wholly changed. The great Lord of the harvest "shall send his angels, and gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." The scene will then be such as so vividly described in the visions of St. John: "And I looked, and behold a white cloud, and upon the cloud one sat like unto the Son of man, having on his head a golden crown, and in his hand a sharp sickle. And another angel came out of the temple, crying with a loud voice to him that sat on the cloud, Thrust in Thy sickle and reap, for the time is come for Thee to reap for the harvest of the earth is ripe. And he that sat on the cloud thrust in his sickle on the earth; and the earth was reaped." This description is immediately followed by the "vintage of the earth;" and what that signifies we shall learn hereafter.

From all that has thus far been advanced, you will understand that the present dispensation, or the state of things now existing, answers exactly to the interval between the seed-time and the harvest. During this interval the text is being fulfilled. The Lord God is "visiting the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name;" and the people thus taken out, including indiscriminately Jews and Gentiles, constitute the Church, or "the Lamb's bride." Their number is fixed and definite, and once completed can neither be added to nor diminished. They cannot, for the simple reason that the same exceptional state of things can never occur again.

Here, then, is another peculiar feature of the present dispensation. It is not miraculous, like that which preceded and that which is to follow it, but purely spiritual.

3. Once more, the destination of those who are thus "taken out," whether Jews or Gentiles (for now there is no difference), is altogether distinct from the destination of those who shall belong to the exclusively Jewish economy which is past, or to that which is to follow. Ours is a heavenly inheritance. "In My Father's house are many mansions; I go to prepare a place for you." That place, therefore, cannot be on the earth, for the simple reason that Christ went away from earth in order to prepare it for us. Nor is it in accordance with revelation that this earth could be now preparing for our inheritance, because, if we believe the sure word of prophecy, this earth is being prepared for, and is hastening on day and night to, a far different fate, as will be my task to show you hereafter. For the same reason it is clear that the "place" of which Christ speaks cannot be the "new earth," for that is not now preparing, nor could be till the earth that now is, and whose place that new creation is to occupy, has "passed away." Whatever or wheresoever may be the home which the Lord Jesus is now preparing for his bride, he has gone away for that purpose; and therefore it cannot be any place upon or in connection with this present earth.

We are bound to approach with deepest reverence a theme so lofty and mysterious; but we are not forbidden—rather are we encouraged—to exercise our highest faculties in truest inquiries on all that God has been pleased to reveal in his Holy Word. Thus doing, the result would seem to be that the inheritance of the bride is a heavenly inheritance. They who shall constitute that body called "the Church," or the "Lamb's bride," are said to be "raised up together, and made to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus." And all this is in order "that, in the ages to come," and surely also in these heavenly places, "He might show the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness towards us through Christ Jesus," Eph. ii. 6, 7.

The [illegible] of Israel, and [illegible] who [illegible] joined with [illegible] yet to come, the third [illegible] Earthly splendor, visible glory, and the dazzling magnificence of riches, have ever, in the days of Israel's prosperity, been his allotted portion. The same, only purified from the dross of covetousness, it would seem is to be their portion upon the new earth also. Witness, for example, that glorious city, the "New Jerusalem," which St. John saw "coming down from God out of heaven"—its streets of pure gold, its gates of pearls, its foundations of precious stones. All this indicates material glory as theirs, whilst theirs is heavenly and spiritual are ours.

The contrast might be carried still further; but sufficient has been said to give you some idea at least of the true character of the present dispensation, and to show the extreme importance of rightly distinguishing those promises and privileges which belong to it, from those which appertain to that which is to follow.

You may take it as a fixed rule, that all those promises which have earthly dignity, splendor, and dominion as their object belong exclusively to restored Israel in a state of things as yet entirely future, and in which, save in respect of brotherly regard and love, the Church now gathering has no concern. The destiny of her members is heavenly and spiritual; and for this destiny they have been under discipline eighteen hundred years and more. Each individual, as called out from the world is purified in the furnace of affliction, fit cut and squared and polished by the hand of the great Master Builder, to be a living stone in that glorious edifice now growing up into an "holy temple unto the Lord."

From all this has been advanced, this inference may now with assured confidence be drawn, that there is not the slightest ground for expecting the "conversion of the world"—as commonly taught by missionary advocates—under the present dispensation. The conversion of the world, in a spiritual sense, such as it is usually understood, is a mere baseless dream, destitute of all countenance or support from Holy Scripture. It is, indeed, as we before said, wholly irreconcilable with our texts for the object of God's visiting the Gentiles, as therein stated, is not to convert the world, but to take out therefrom a people for his name. The period of this world's history in which we are now living is called "the times of the Gentiles," and during the whole of that period, and until "the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled," "Jerusalem" is "trodden down of the Gentile," Luke xxi. 24. This apparently harsh doom has yet a most beneficent design towards both Jews and Gentiles. "For," returning once more to Romans xi., we read, 25, "I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in." "In part," you observe, i. e., partial blindness only, for the Apostles themselves were Jews, and many thousands of that nation were converted to Christ by their ministry. But when the fulness of the Gentiles is come in, then, he adds, 'all Israel shall be saved.'

The scene will then be wholly changed. God will turn his hand again in mercy to his ancient people, beloved still for their fathers' sake. Again, as in former days, he will deal with them "nationally," miraculously, and in such fulness of blessing as it is not possible even to conceive. For of that period it is that he thus speaks in the language of such strong affection, "I will rejoice over them to do them good, and I will plant them in this land assuredly, with my whole heart, and with my whole soul," Jer. xxxii. 41.

But then, remember, the day of grace for the Gentiles will have passed away. The Bridegroom will have come, and the "wise virgins" have entered with him to the marriage, but the foolish and unready been left out in outer darkness.

You see, therefore, the necessity of having something more than outward profession. This is a dispensation purely spiritual, and during which forms and ceremonies and rituals count for next to nothing. God is taking out and building up a [illegible] Church, and [illegible] Christ Jesus, [illegible] Eph. ii. 20. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

"HE CARETH."

What can it mean? It ought to Him
That the nights are long and the days are dim?
Can He be touched by the griefs I bear,
Which redden the heart and whiten the hair
About His throne are eternal calms
And strong, glad music of happy psalms.
And bliss, unruffled by any strife—
How can He care for my little life?

And yet I want Him to care for me
While I live in the world where the sorrows be;
When the lights die down from the path I take,
When strength is feeble, and friends forsake;
When love and music that once did bless,
Have left me to silence and loneliness,
And my life-song changes to sobbing prayers,
Then my heart cries out for a God who cares.

When shadows hang over the whole day long,
And my spirit is bowed with shame and wrong;
When I am not good, and the deeper shade
Of numerless sin invites my heart afraid,
And the busy world has so much to do
To stay in its courses to help me through,
And I long for a Savior—can it be
That the God of the universe cares for me?

Oh, wonderful story of deathless love!
Each child is dear to that heart above.
He fights for me when I cannot fight,
He comforts me in the gloom of night.
He lifts the burden, for He is strong;
He stills the sighs, and awakes the song;
The sorrow that bowed me down He bore,
And forces and pardons for grace He cares!

Let all who are sad take heart again;
We are not alone in our losses of pain:
Our Father stoops from his throne above
To comfort and quiet us with his love.
He leaves us not when the storm is high.
And we have safety, for he is nigh.
Can it be trouble which He doth share?
Oh, rest in peace, for the Lord will care!

THE MILLENNIUM, OR THE THOUSAND YEARS.

There are very ancient books also, not included in the canon of Holy Scripture, which teach the Pre-Millennial doctrine. While these are not of divine authority, they nevertheless confirm the teaching of the Scripture, and show the general belief of those early times.

The book of Enoch, an apocryphal work, and which appeared before the time of our Lord, teaches that there will be a Millennium; that the righteous shall dwell in peace; that a rich reward shall be given to the martyrs; that they shall all be glorified and blessed.

An apocryphal work, called the Testament of the XII Patriarchs, written probably about the same time as the authentic Scriptures, declares "that [illegible] of the race of Judah is coming [illegible] will restore all things and reign forever." It teaches the resurrection of the saints, the appearance of God upon the earth, and the salvation of the Israelitish race. It teaches the gathering of the just out of all nations, the dwelling of the Most High in their midst, and the eternal duration of his kingdom.

Professor Stuart, in his Commentary on the Apocalypse, mentions another apocryphal work, entitled The Ascension of Isaiah, in which are similar sentiments. Millenarianism is plainly advocated by the writer. After teaching that there will prevail in the church false doctrine and erroneous practice, and that the Lord's people will be persecuted by an ungodly and wicked monarch, instigated by the devils, he shows that the Lord, accompanied with the saints, shall come down to earth, and that in great glory and splendor the saints shall enjoy a Millennial period of blessedness.

In other apocryphal works, The Second Book of Esdras, and the Fourth Book of Ezra, the writers also hold forth a Millennial season. In the latter work it is taught that there shall come a new age, and that "Paradise shall appear in all its glory."

Many of the ancient fathers believed that the world would continue for six thousand years, and that then the new age, or Millennium, would commence. They believed that as God occupied six days in the creation, and the seventh day was a rest-day, so the end of the several dispensations shall be accomplished in six thousand years, and the seventh thousand shall be the world's rest. Indeed, this was the belief not only by the early Christian Fathers, but it was a tradition among the Jews long before the time of our Lord, and was maintained also by writers of other nations. We are informed by one great scholar, David Gregory, who flourished nearly two centuries ago, that the Hebrew letter Aleph, in the Jewish arithmetic, stands for 1000, and that that letter occurs six times in the first chapter of Genesis. The inference was drawn also from this fact that six thousand years would be the duration of the world as it now is.

Again; this Millennium, or the thousand years' reign upon the earth, will not take place till the Lord himself returns at the winding up of the present age. It is his coming, and the judgment scenes which will precede, and accompany and follow his coming, that [illegible] the present world-powers and prepare the way for the establishment of his own and the saints' reign. Much light is thrown on this point by the well known, but generally misunderstood, phrase in Isa. ix. 6, as applied to the Divine Son, "Everlasting Father," but which is given in the margin, "Father of eternity." The Septuagint translates this, "The Father of the coming Age." Bishop Lowth renders it, "The Father of the Everlasting Age." The meaning of this is, as one writer observes, that Christ is to be "the Introducer of a new age in the history of the Jewish people, and of the whole earth." And not only will he introduce the new age, but he will govern all the affairs thereof. Then it will be that "the government shall be upon his shoulder," and his kingdom shall be upheld "with judgment and with righteousness," from that time forth even for ever.

The error is a serious one, as it engenders false hopes, that we shall have the Millennium during the present dispensation; that men every where by the present means and agencies will be won over to receive the truth and believe in the Christ. All believers, all who have embraced the truth, and have experienced the blessed freedom of the truth, would be glad if all men would embrace it. There is no true Christian but would rejoice in the universal acceptance of the gospel; but the question is, Does the New Testament hold out any hope that all men will embrace the gospel in the present age? We say positively, It does not. So far from holding out any such hope, it teaches plainly that all will not embrace it, that multitudes will reject it, that unbelief and wickedness will continue and even increase until the end. And if an apostasy is foretold that is to continue till the Lord comes, how can there be a Millennium of universal righteousness before he comes? It were only deceiving ourselves to dream of the world's conversion in this age. Through the eighteen centuries that have passed, unnumbered preachers and evangelists, many, of mighty faith and power, have proclaimed the glad tidings; and today there are multitudes in almost every nation under heaven engaged in Christian work; but where can you find a single city, or town, or village where all have received the truth?

Any doctrine, therefore, unknown to the apostles and disciples, and the church of the first and second centuries, must be an unscriptural doctrine; and such is the doctrine that the Millennium, or the conversion of the world, is to take place prior to the coming of the Son of God.

According to the popular teaching, the Millennium is to take place previous to the resurrection; but according to apostolic teaching, it is to take place after. When Christ reigns for the thousand years, his saints are to reign with him; but they cannot reign with him until they who are asleep in Jesus have passed through the resurrection state, and they who are alive have been translated; for it is not until he comes that they will receive their crowns.

The current theory is opposed to the spirit and teaching of the parable of the wheat and the tares. Those are not to be separated, but are to "grow together till the harvest," or the end of the age when Christ shall come in judgment. But how can the growth of evil along side with the growth of good continue till the close of this dispensation, if all are to be saved, and a thousand years of righteousness are to take place before the second coming of Christ. The prevailing view of the Millennium thus teaches that the wheat and the tares shall not grow together till the harvest, but that the tares shall all be converted into wheat, and also puts off the second coming of Christ a thousand years.

The current interpretation of the Millennium renders it next to impossible to obey some of the plainest requirements of Scripture. Scripture requires us to watch for the Savior's coming, to look for his appearing; but if the world is to be converted, and there is to be a Millennium of a spiritual reign before Christ comes, he will not yet come for many generations, and therefore, we cannot watch or look or even hope for his coming in our day. The popular view thus conflicts with the Scriptural view on almost every phase of the subject. Yet thousands shut their eyes and will not look at this matter. They seem content to go on in error; but little do they think how much precious truth they lose, and how many rich blessings they forfeit. Christians generally place the second advent too far off; they look forward to it as an event in the far distance, in some very remote period in the future. They should look upon it as possibly very near, and should never cease to their beds without the thought that Christ may appear before the morning light, and the call to [illegible] Are you ready?

"GOD HATH SPOKEN."

This is a sublime announcement. The Mighty God even Jehovah hath spoken and called the earth from the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof. His audience is an innumerable host. Every nation, tribe and tongue, y t his voice will reach them. Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined, and this light shall light to every land. Speech and light are the most perfect mediums for the removal of ignorance and death.

He has spoken many times and in a vast variety of ways, leaving no room for any one misunderstanding him or remaining in disobedience to his will. His past speeches and judgments form the most perfect library of instruction in existence, and carry the idea of divinity into the consciences of every one who reads them. As it is written of the last revelation given, "Blessed is he that readeth and they that hear the words of this prophecy and keep the things that are written therein, for the time is at hand," so it may be said of all the past revelations, "Blessed are they who delight in the law of the Lord and meditate therein day and night." God, says the apostle, hath spoken to us in these last days by a Son whom he hath appointed heir of all things.

The Creator of all things hath spoken to us by the heir of all things; but before he spake by him he spake of him. First he spoke concerning his conception, second of his name, third of his power, and fourth of his throne and kingdom.

First, concerning the conception. Gabriel told his mother Mary to fear not, for she had found favor with God and would conceive in her womb and bring forth a son.

Second, he said thou shalt call his name Jesus for he shall save his people from their sins.

Third, he shall be great and shall be called the Son of the Highest.

Fourth, the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end. Truly the child spoken of is altogether a Divine production. Divine favor is the root of his conception. Divine favor and wisdom are embodied in his name. Divine power shall be in him and shall draw even from his enemies the true cause of his existence, "Truly this was the Son of God."

The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end. This statement has so much of detail and at the same time a historical basis, that a child cannot mistake its meaning. Indeed unbelief of the Divine speaker's words is the only explanation that can be given for the attitude of the professed Christian churches of today.

Now as the us referred to in the apostle's letter were a remnant of the house of Jacob then living on the land covenanted to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, we are put in to possession of all the materials of coming to an understanding of what God has said to them.

We have therefore to keep in view that the speaker is Jehovah, the God, the Creator and Redeemer of Israel. Second he has spoken by a son or his Son, and third, he has spoken to the remnant of the house of Jacob. Let us now turn our attention to what he has spoken by his Son, the heir of all things, to the remnant of his people. In Matthew iv. 17 it is written, "From that time Jesus began to preach and to say, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." This is the opening speech of Jesus and on this account it calls for the greatest care on our part if we are to be benefitted by it. The first part, "Repent," clearly shows that the remnant of Israel were in a state of rebellion toward's Jehovah their King. The call was therefore a call to repent of their present state and turn from it. This call could not be misunderstood by those who heard it. The application was to every one in the land of the house, or remnant of the house, of Israel, there and then. The reason given for repentance is, "For the kingdom of heaven is at hand." This could not fail to guide those who repented of their former state into subjection to the speaker whom we have found before was Jehovah. This seems to be the only possible conclusion we can arrive at when we keep before us the oft repeated statement of Jesus, "I must preach the kingdom of God, for therefore am I sent," and also his saying, "I must work the works of him that sent me."

The interchangeable phrases "the kingdom of heaven" and "the kingdom of God" clearly show that whoever believed and obeyed the preaching of Jesus, obeyed the preaching of Jehovah, as he was the speaker who made use of his Son to speak his words to Israel instead of doing it himself. We may therefore, for the sake of simplicity, leave the Son out of view while we listen to Jehovah.

In Mark i. 14, 15, it is written, "Now after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand, repent ye and believe the gospel. The two additional details given by Mark make Matthew's statement still easier understood. These details are the addition of the word "gospel" to the phrase, "the kingdom of God" and the phrase "the time is fulfilled." The last phrase completely strikes out the idea of referring the matter to a future time, and the introduction of the word gospel into the phrase the kingdom of God, gives in a complete form the preaching of Jesus. Putting together the statements of Matthew and Mark we have the full statement. "The time is fulfilled and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent ye and believe the gospel." The gospel of the kingdom of God preached by Jesus consisted of these two things, "The time is fulfilled and the kingdom of God is at hand." Some have added to the words of this proclamation the idea that the time for setting up the kingdom of God according to Dan. ii. 44 had come; but on account of the unbelief of those in Judea, the time for doing so was put off indefinitely. This idea reduces the gospel preached by Jesus to a sort of conditional matter by which men have the power of defeating the Almighty Sovereign and causing him to delay his purposes. Others, from the same mistake of making the setting up of God's kingdom in the permanent form the proclamation made by Jesus, have failed to perceive the thing which God caused to be proclaimed to the remnant of Israel then in the land.

The statement of Jehovah by Dan. ii. 44, refers to an administration over his own kingdom and not to everything absolutely new, as it is the same peoples that ruled over the different dynasties named. The setting up of a kingdom here means the placing a permanent administration over them.

Some ten years or so before this, according to the common chronology, God by the prophet Ezekiel said to Zedekiah the king of Judah as it is written, chap. xxi. 26, "And thou profane, wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come when iniquity shall have an end, Thus saith the Lord God: Remove the diadem and take off the crown; this shall not be the same; exalt him that is low and abase him that is high. I will overturn, overturn, overturn it, and it shall be no more until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him." This statement has to do with the dynasty then ruling upon the throne of Jehovah. He intimates three overturnings to be followed by a state called "no more" which means either that the seed of David had become extinct in respect to heirs or that no heir of David's house would sit upon his throne at the time the rightful heir would come. The repeated overturnings show conclusively that the vassal dynasty was of a most rebellious character, and its final suppression also shows that the rightful heir was not in the loins of any descendant of David. Of this David was perfectly aware when he uttered the words, "Although my house be not so with God yet hath he made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure; for this is all my salvation and all my desire, although he make it not to grow." 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. From this declaration we learn that all David's salvation and all his desire were resting upon Jehovah's covenant and oath were ever present before him and the time which he had marked out and revealed to Daniel for the birth and subsequent anointing of the Most Holy One had come. Hence the Divine proclamation, sent first by John the Baptist, and after the public recognition of Jesus by God, and John was cast into prison, by Jesus, saying, "The time is fulfilled and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent ye and believe the gospel."

This proclamation had reference to the rightful heir of the throne of Israel, to the new and divine dynasty which Jehovah had declared he was to raise up to David, not one of David's house, as David was shown by the Spirit of Jehovah that his house was not so with God. Thirty years before this proclamation Jehovah revealed to Mary, his chosen hand-maid, that he would give to him, her son, the throne of his father David i. e., his ancestral father according to the flesh, but not his real father, as the same communication given to Mary sufficiently guarded her from that mistake.

The time that was fulfilled was that referred to by the covenant and the promises of Jehovah for the manifesting of his heir whom he had destined to rule over men. The gospel at this time had reference to Jehovah's Christ and to nothing else. His presence and his possession of Jehovah's power made sure that every promise and covenant made by Jehovah concerning him would be fulfilled each in its own time and season, as the gospel or glad news had to do not only with what shall be but more especially then with what had taken place; its real point and practical power was now centered in the personage who spoke to Israel in Jehovah's name and who claimed he was this Son and was invested with all power in heaven and on earth to subject all things to his will.

The practical bearing of the proclamation "The kingdom of heaven is at hand," is as:—

The command to repent preceding the proclamation shows that instant relief was contained in it to every one who received it. The glad news from the foundation of the world was that the seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent; but now it contained this further element of fact. The child has been born and the Son has been given and divinely attested. We have now in addition to the seed of the serpent the seed of the woman, the divinely perfect instrument for the perfecting of the servants of God and for the total subjection of every form of rebellion.

The mission of the woman's seed was not simply to give up his heel to be bruised, but that he might bruise the head of the serpent. His mission was not simply that he might heal all who were bitten, but that he might destroy the biter. Not simply that he might give relief from the effects of disobedience but that he might destroy the cause. Deliverance from the effects of disobedience is indeed a great boon. Food when one is famishing of hunger is a great boon and entitled to the name of good news to the perishing. Health to the sick in like manner is a great good. Life to the dying is also one of the good things which all can fully accept as good news. But these good things one and all give simply temporary relief if they leave the receivers exposed to hunger again, to be sick again, and to perish again. Temporary relief gives the sufferer a little [illegible] time to find permanent relief if [illegible] possible. The [illegible] in the declaration "He shall bruise thy head," is not one of temporary but of permanent relief. It is not one of partial conquest but of absolute destruction. It is the intimation not that the head will be converted but that it will be destroyed.

The head of the serpent had ruled and had crushed the seed of the promise from the time it was given. God had already given temporary relief many times; and thus he manifested the permanent good which he purposed from the first. The presence of the Lord Jesus in his land with temporary and also permanent relief from the effects of their disobedience and from the causes which led to disobedience. This formed the grand and good news that God's kingdom had come. "Repentance towards God for past disobedience and faith towards the Lord Jesus Christ as the ground for future obedience;" these and these only form the foundation stones of temporary relief or present forgiveness and the pledge or earnest of permanent salvation from sin and death and the inheritance of God's kingdom.

A Memory.

An old-world country garden, where the bees
Like winged sunbeams flash in glory by,
And where the scent of strange old-fashioned flowers
Brings back a tender bygone memory,
The walks are straight and patterned with white stone,
And pacing there with reverential tread,
I dream once more I hold within my own
The soft warm fingers of the child who's dead—
The child whose dainty footsteps trod when mine,
As we two chased the golden butterflies;
The child who revelled in the bright sunshine,
And shrined her gladness in her laughing eyes!
We used to linger to the soft, long grass,
And when a sun-ray kissed her dimpled hand,
We told each other 'twas a fairy pass
To read the secrets of our fairyland;
And, holding safely in her radiant face
That happy sparkle, we would run to peep
If dewdrops trembled in the self same place,
Or last night's bud had blossomed in its sleep.
I throned her in my arms when tired of play,
And whispered love names in the baby's ears!
She made the glory of the summer's day,
My wee liege lady of her five short years!
And now! Small wonder that the roses lie
In petals fragrance by the daisies' side,
For sunshine vanished with our last soft sigh—
And skies are grayer since our darling died.

The Everlasting Love.

"No, Charley, I shall not kiss you tonight, you have been a bad, trouble some boy today, and I wish you to go [illegible] that you have displeased me, and your Heavenly Father, too. God [illegible] not love bad children, and neither do I."

It was a mother's voice that spoke, but her tone was cold and unsympathetic. The boy looked at her wistfully for a moment, and then left the room with a troubled face.

"There is no use in saying my prayers tonight," he said to himself as he crept into bed. "If God is angry with me, he will not listen to me, and I don't care."

Down stairs the mother bent over her work with an aching heart, as she thought of her boy's waywardness; and as she lifted up her heart in prayer for him, she little knew that with her own hand, that night, she had sowed a seed of infidelity that would spring up into luxuriant growth in time to come.

Twenty-five years later a guilt-stained man, bowed down under the weight of remorse, sat with his face buried in his hands, in his pastor's study. "It is useless to talk to me of God's mercy and love," he cried bitterly. "I have sinned too deeply, God is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity. For me there can be only fearful looking forward to judgment."

Vainly the tender voice spoke to him of the pity of him who "receiveth sinners," of the "blood that cleanseth," of the love that is "everlasting." Too long had it been the habit of his mind to feel that God was an enemy to be feared—one whose power was used to overthrow the sinner, one to whom "vengeance belongeth." The beautiful promises of the Gospel fell upon deaf ears. "I have sinned too deeply, there is no hope for me," was his unvarying answer; and when the interview was over, he sought to drown his remorse by plunging into still deeper excesses.

"God does not love bad children." Mothers, beware that this heresy be not taught in your nurseries. Love begets love, and hate begets hate.

Let the thought most deeply impressed upon the young hearts given by your care be, that the awfulness of sin is that it is a wrong against love. That it is not God's anger they should fear, or the punishment that follows wrong-doing, but that they should most dread to grieve the dear Savior, who has said to each one of us, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love."

Teach your little ones that God is so war with sin because he "loves the sinner, and [illegible] the bands with which Satan has bound him; that even when we trample on that love, we cannot destroy it; that we are his by creation, his by purchase, and that he cannot forget the work of his own hands; for if this thought be truly impressed, although in after life, conscience may be stifled, and the wrong path chosen for a while, there may come a time when the prodigal will weary of his husks, and then his penitent eyes will be lifted, not despairingly, but hopefully, to the Father's house, as he sees Christ, not as the door closed against him, but the opening door through which he may gain access to that Father's presence.

Dear Children.

It may be pleasing for you to read about one of the most splendid cities that ever existed, its name signifies "Confusion." Its form was an exact square, built in a large plain; its circumference was sixty miles, the walls were seven feet in thickness, and three hundred and fifty feet in height, on which were built three hundred and sixty towers. These walls and towers were constructed of large bricks cemented with bitumen, a glutinous slime, which in that country issues out of the earth. Without the wall the city was surrounded by a deep ditch, filled with water, and lined with bricks on both sides. It had a hundred gates of solid brass, twenty-five on each side, from these ran twenty-five streets crossing one another at right angles, each one hundred and fifty feet wide, and fifteen miles in length. A row of houses faced the wall on every side, with a street of two hundred feet between them and it. Thus the whole city was divided into six hundred and seventy-six squares. All around these stood the houses fronting the streets, and the empty space between stood for gardens. A branch of a beautiful river, which name signifies, "That makes fruitful," running through the city from north to south, divided it into two parts. On each side of the river was a key, and high wall of the same thickness with that of the city. In this, over against every street were brazen gates, and from them a descent by steps to the river. A magnificent bridge thirty feet wide joined the two parts of the city in the middle. At the east end of this stately bridge stood the old palace, which took up four squares, and was four miles in circumference. Next to it stood the magnificent temple of their [illegible] god, on the top of the tower above mentioned. History says, the riches of this temple amounted to about twenty-one millions sterling. Its statues and vessels were all of massive gold. At the west end of the bridge stood the new palace, which occupied nine squares, and eight miles in circumference. On the walls of these palaces a display of animals were represented to the life, and you entered by magnificent gates of brass. A vault beneath the channel of the river afforded a secret communication between the two palaces. But nothing was more stupendously beautiful than the hanging gardens which were built by the new palace.

They contained a square of four hundred feet on each side, and consisted of terraces one above another, carried up to the height of the walls, the ascent from terrace to terrace being by steps, ten feet wide. The whole consisted of substantial arches upon arches, and was strengthened with a surrounding wall, twenty two feet thick. The floors on each terrace were laid in this order, first, on the top of the arches was laid a pavement of stones, each sixteen feet long, and four broad, over this a layer of reed mixed with a great quantity of bitumen, over this, two courses of brick closely cemented, over all these, were thick sheets of lead, and on these the earth or mould of the garden, so deep as to give sufficient root to the largest trees. Upon the uppermost terrace was a reservoir, supplied by a certain engine with water from the river, and [illegible] whence the gardens on the [illegible] races were supplied with moi[illegible]

This being [illegible]is only temporal, [illegible]ge our present life, [illegible]death, and restored [illegible]from our sleep in the [illegible]We are then as Adam [illegible]came from the hand of [illegible]entences here quoted [illegible]ptive speculation for [illegible] foundation in the [illegible]s not one text in [illegible]t mortal life is [illegible] and restored in [illegible]ore but two lives [illegible]ture, and there [illegible]ls mortal or immortal? See also [illegible]ist ed[illegible]; verily, I say unto you, he that [illegible] the future, "that [illegible]Tim. iv. 8. Not- [illegible]o book that we [illegible]ear the image of [illegible]these things are [illegible] will not some advo- [illegible]l resurrection theory [illegible]chapter and verses that [illegible]y know where it is? We [illegible]hen he shall appear we [illegible]rebuilt [illegible], we shall see him [illegible]y, he is immortal [illegible]and therefore we [illegible]ll be, when he [illegible]time, on the in- [illegible]Cor. xv. 51, we [illegible]at we all shall be [illegible]in the twinkling [illegible]undergoing any [illegible]. Of these grand [illegible]ubts there is an abun- [illegible]of all through the Scrip- [illegible]xix; 2 Cor. ii. 16, 16; Gal. iv. [illegible] Dan. xii. 2, and Rev. xvi. 5 are [illegible]oted to prove that the unrighteous [illegible]all perish. This we admit—that [illegible]y will be utterly consumed as the [illegible]of lambs, etc., etc. Therefore we [illegible]ss by such texts without comment.

Again of the righteous he says, [illegible]their bodies will be perfected as the [illegible]dy of Jesus was perfected in its as- [illegible]nt to the Father. Spirit or power [illegible]ll be imparted to them without meas- [illegible]re, so that their bodies conceived in [illegible]e dust of sheol, and capable of re- [illegible]rning thither, will be deprived of [illegible]st tendency, and be transformed into [illegible]e likeness of the glorious body of [illegible]sus, who never will be mistaken [illegible]gain for the gardener of Gethsemane. [illegible]Hence the transforming operation is [illegible]e quickening or the imparting of [illegible]corruptibility and life to bodies al- [illegible]ady endowed with temporal life."

Be it observed here that the author [illegible] Anastasis, here as elsewhere, ig- [illegible]ores the import or meaning of words [illegible] the English language, and defines [illegible]em to suit his theory, regardless of [illegible]tely acknowledged signification by our [illegible]standard lexicographers. They say to [illegible]oken is "to make alive," to trans- [illegible]rm is to "change the form of, to [illegible]nge in shape or appearance." He [illegible]ys the transforming operation is the [illegible]ickening. Then he says "the cast- [illegible]g of the dead out of the earth only [illegible]ts them into the position occupied [illegible] those who are alive at the advent of [illegible]rist. These, not having died, are [illegible]pared for transformation. If the [illegible]vent occurred immediately it would find them living men and women, waiting to be gathered together at the tribunal of Christ. They will appear there an unquickened assembly, bearing the image of the earthly Adam (1 Cor. xv. 49) and in that image standing before the Last Adam the quickening spirit, that it may be seen if they be worthy from their account given of themselves to bear the image of the heavenly." 1 Cor. xv. 49 reads, And as we have borne the image of the earthly, let us also bear the image of the heavenly. Here it is very clearly manifest that the bearing of the image of the earthly is put in the past perfect tense, while the bearing of the heavenly is in the future tense. Paul here was looking back to the first dawn of earthly existence which was then stamped with the similitude of the first Adam, and as that existence still was his, he therefore expressed it in the past perfect. By no legitimate construction of this language can both conditions appear as in the future.

Again he says, "The fitness of things requires that all the dead and all the living gathered to the judgment seat of Christ should appear there an unquickened host." This is but a theory of uninspired men. But the inspired apostle Paul differs very widely from such, for he says in 2 Tim. iv. 1, "I charge thee in the sight of God, and of Christ Jesus who shall judge the quick and dead, and by his appearing and his kingdom. Here it is very plainly stated that Christ, at his appearing, will judge two classes, to-wit, the quick, the living, those who are looking for him, and the dead, those who are asleep in him. See also Rom. xiv. 9; Acts x. 42, and many other texts with the same view. Some may ask here how can Christ judge the dead? See Luke x. 35. But they who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world or age and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor or given in marriage. Neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection.

Here we see that they are judged worthy of life else they would not be called forth from sheol, and still further the fact of attaining unto a resurrection places them on an equality with the angels. Ask yourself, O earnest searcher after God's truth freed from human tradition, are the [illegible]ls mortal or immortal? See also [illegible]; verily, I say unto you, he that hearoth my word and believeth on him that sent me, hath eternal life and cometh not unto judgment, but hath passed out of death into life. See also 29th verse, Marvel not at this, for the hour cometh in which all that are in the tombs shall hear his voice and come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done ill unto the resurrection of judgment.

Again we quote, "The attentive reader of the Scriptures will have perceived that a distinction is made in things pertaining to the resurrection process." Thus in John v. 21 Jesus says, "As the Father rebuilds the dead ones and quickeneth them, so also the Son imparts life, or quickens whom he will." No such phrase as "rebuilds the dead ones" occurs in the Scriptures. This I have before shown, and now repeat with the reason for making the assertion. The word in the original of the text is "egeiro," which signifies to raise, or rouse up, and not "banah" which signifies to build.

Again we read, "Here the dead are first awakened, which implies the rebuilding of their dust, and their animation, and afterward quickened with unending life and power." These thoughts have no foundation in revelation. They are but the imaginings of an uninspired man to which the wise, or even the babes in Christ, should give no heed. He continues, "According to Paul, Jesus himself was the subject of these operations. This appears from Rom. xiv. 9, where he says that Christ hath died and rose and revived. Here are two distinct things affirmed of him after his death. Paul was not content with saying that he died and rose, because that form of speech did not express all that happened to him." In this text in the original "anesta," or rose, from which anastasis is derived, did not express the whole truth, for the dead may stand up and yet not be quickened. For this reason Paul adds the word "anedsese," which signifies to live with increased and strengthened life which was consequent upon his being quickened by the Father or spirit who caused him after he died to stand up.

Surely there is here a misapprehension of plain language, for reviving was embodied in the fact of rising, and we find in the R. V. that the revisers kept this thought in mind, and therefore rendered this text, "For to this end Christ died and lived again." This is all sufficient to express what he did, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living. John vi. 63 has no evidence that can be taken as sustaining "mortal emergence;" it reads, "It is the spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing. The words I have spoken unto you are spirit and are life." Now apparently supposing he has established a premise in the case of Christ's resurrection, he continues, "And so also of all who are to be raised; they are said first to come forth from their graves, but this is not all. When they have come forth they stand up; but what do they stand there at the gates of sheol for? To what have they emerged from thence? The Lord Jesus answers these questions as follows. They who have done good things come forth unto a standing up of life, but they who have done evil things unto a standing up of condemnation. Jno. v. 29. In this the life and the judgment are subsequent to the coming forth, for the Lord says they come forth to, or for, these results, which are awarded to them according to the good or evil they may have done before they entered sheol."

On this quotation I will observe first, we have no account that anyone ever asked Jesus why the resurrected dead stood at the gates of sheol. The text quoted shows very plainly that they are not called forth to see what their portion may be, whether life or death; but that each case is known and understood, and they are called forth to receive that which they have respectively sought after while in this life. They will be rewarded according to the deeds or works done while in the body or this life. But although the Scriptures teach this divine truth with all plainness and simplicity, the author of Anastasis proceeds to give a very different view of resurrection to that presented by inspired penmen. He says, "Such then are the things and the order of their development in the resurrection period. First, reorganization of dust as a basis for personal identity; then the breathing into the nostrils the breath of the spirit of life, that the individual may awake and stand upon his feet; after this, restoration of identity for appearance at the judgment seat of Christ, that the appearer may give account of himself to that Righteous Judge in presence of the angelic apparitors of his court; afterward when these proceedings are closed and sentence in accord with the account rendered, then draws the line of separation between him that serveth Elohim and him that serveth him not, (Mal. iii. 18), between the just and the unjust; then spirit power administered by the Judge quickens, or imparts incorruptibility and life to the just, who, in the instantaneity of the operation, ascend to the Father who is Spirit, or are corporeally transformed into identity of nature with the body of Christ. Such is resurrection, from conception in the dust of sheol, to the quickening inception of a life that ends no more."

From the first quotation I have given from Anastasis to the end of the last paragraph, there is not one text of Scripture that can, by any possible perversion, be made to show that the dust of dead bodies is reorganized in order to restore their identity. There is not within the lids of the book one text, one phrase, one sentence to lead us to suppose that dead bodies are evolved from sheol and that divine messengers are sent round amongst them to breathe into their nostrils the breath of life. I have already shown from the word that there was no conception in the dust of sheol in the case of Jesus the first fruits of the resurrection unto life, and that therefore there will be none in the harvest that is to follow. In the word of life there is no proof for the doctrine of "mortal emergence" any more than for the lofty flights of fancy in "Milton's Paradise Lost," where he has the demons of hell dragging the lost spirits, first through lakes of flaming fire and brimstone, and then at once transporting them to mountains of perpetual snow. Alas, alas, that the sure word of the living God should be set at naught and the vain imagination of man obeyed in its stead.

But we must continue these extracts, that the utter absurdity of this theory may be brought forth to the light of day, that intelligent men and women, who profess to have come out of the mystic Babylon and to study the Bible for themselves, may know what this theory of "mortal emergence" is, to which they have given a tacit consent as it were. They surely have not compared it with the word else it would have long since gone to that land of darkness and oblivion that forever enshrouds all that it embraces.

"Some idea of the extraordinary change wrought upon the mortal body by its quickening may be formed from Daniel's description of the certain man he saw in the third year of Cyrus, which was the year in which he was consigned to sheol, now 2466 years ago. Dan. i. 21; x. 1–5. That certain man represented to him was what Paul styles in Eph. iv. 4, and i. 22, 23, the one body, the Ecclesia of which Christ is the head."

I will here give the texts cited that every reader may see for themselves that there is not the slightest proof contained in them of what is merely assumed for them. Dan. i. 21 reads, "And Daniel continued even unto the first year of king Cyrus." Dan. x. 1–5 reads, "In the third year of Cyrus, king of Persia, a thing was revealed unto Daniel whose name was Belteshazzar; and the thing was true, even a great warfare; and he understood the thing and had understanding of the vision. In those days I, Daniel, was mourning three whole weeks. I ate no pleasant bread, neither came flesh or wine in my mouth, neither did I anoint myself at all till three whole weeks were fulfilled. And in the four and twentieth day of the first month, as I was by the side of the great river which is Tigris, I lifted my eyes and looked, and behold a man clothed in linen whose loins were girded about with pure gold of Uphaz." Eph. iv. 4, reads, "There is one body and one spirit even as also ye were called in one hope of your calling." Eph. i. 22, 23, "And hath put all things under his feet and gave him to be the head over all things to the church which is his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all."

Surely no one can possibly understand by these references that the heavenly messenger sent to tell Daniel what should befall his people in the latter days, was the redeemed church of the future, which will be made of faithful ones, both Jew and Gentile. There is not the slightest ground on which to base the supposition that this heavenly messenger represented the body corporate of justified ones, or that in this case he represented anything more than one of the many servitors of the Most High. In this case he sent forth to show to Daniel what was marked out by divine power as the portion of his people in the future.

He quotes beyond the fifth verse, "His body also like the beryl and his face as the appearance of lightning, and his eyes as lamps of fire, and his arms and his feet in color like to polished brass, and the voice of his words like to the voice of a multitude." "Of this host Daniel was assured he should become at the end of the days," which would reach from a given event to the epoch of the resurrection in the latter days."

In this quotation it is assumed that it was a host here spoken of and represented, simply because it is said that the voice of his words was like the voice of a multitude. The simple language conveys no such thought. The voice of the heavenly messenger is described as being very powerful even as the voice of a great multitude.

Daniel is told that he shall rest and stand in his lot (or place) at the end of the days. He was given full assurance that he would be remembered in the resurrection even though his people should be called upon to pass through deep and terrible trials for their iniquity. It would be very advisable for every reader to read Dan. xii, and there perceive that the "man clothed in linen" is again brought to notice and in such a way as utterly forbids the thought that he represents the Christ body of the future.

Or, A Scriptural View of the Second Coming of Christ, with the Wonderful Signs that will Precede It, and the still more Wonderful Things that will follow it.

—BY SILAS HENN.—

NOTICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS:

The book is truthful, reverent and instructive, every way worthy of the attention of those who prefer calm argument to sensational speculation.—The Exhibitor.

We are desirous to secure as wide circulation with the general people of the book, and to bespeak for it a wide and cordial reception.—The Messenger.

The volume before us is evidently the product of a thoughtful mind, and deserves the careful study of every Christian, being of a very comprehensive character, and based on Scripture. Certainly it is the best work on the subject which has come under our notice.—The Sydney Observer.

The treatment shows that the author has studied well and patiently digested his theme before writing upon it, and we feel as we read page after page, elucidated rather than clogged in our inquiry. . . . The aim of the volume before us is to set the truth clearly before the mind, and so restore it to its place in the consciousness of the church the hope that was once so dear to God's suffering saints, and is still so to many, but which is always unwelcome to a worldly, cold and formal church, and hated by the world. This little volume will be received and read with pleasure by all who take interest in prophetic subjects.—Rev. Nathaniel West, D. D.

THE COMING AGE,

—ITS—

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WEETHEE.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years, has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraph and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research, covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is very valuable, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. Eclectic in every political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled his predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discovers the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, in shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Great Overruler Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth Price $2.00. Send to this office for this work.

THE COMING OF JESUS, THE KING AND THE DELIVERER.

Some objectors urge that certain passages of Scripture have raised expectations of the Lord's speedy coming which have not yet been realized. Many Christians right down through the ages have been, it is thought, thus misled. The passages alluded to are of the following class:—"The Lord is at hand." "The kingdom of heaven is at hand." "The day of the Lord draweth near." "Truly I come quickly." According to our arithmetic, according to our mode of reckoning, these words may not accord with facts. But the words are true according to God's arithmetic, or to his mode of measuring time and distance. With him one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. So taught the apostle Peter. This is explained by Dr. James Glasgow to mean "that a day in God's reckoning of his own works is as a thousand years of human reckoning." The long period, as we should call it, between the time when Christ was on earth, and the time when he shall come again, is designated by Christ himself, a little while. "A little while," he said to his disciples, "and ye behold me no more: and again a little while, and ye shall see me." John xvi. 16. By such language as "I come quickly," the Holy Spirit evidently designed the church to keep the eye of her faith steadily fixed on the second appearing of Jesus, with a view of her being in a state of constant readiness. He made use of this as a motive to entire holiness, by which believers all through the ages of the dispensation should be influenced. But in these last days, as knowledge has increased, and revelation has been seen in a clearer light, we understand this language better than the early Christians understood it. The vision which to them was shut up is now open, or is fast opening. As the times of the Gentiles have been running out, the time of the end has been involved in much mystery; and this has doubtless been permitted for a wise end; but now that those times have nearly run out, things that were hidden are now discovered, and truths that were only dimly seen, are now seen more clearly and understood more fully. The above language, therefore, has to us a wonderful significance. The reasons are weighty and powerful which force upon us the conviction, that the coming of Christ is near, and that the day of the Lord is at hand.

But the coming of Christ and the day of the Lord are terms not to be confounded. There is sometimes a distinction to be made; they do not always mean the same. The term, the day of the Lord, is the term mostly used by the prophets, and it always relates to the return of the Lord to Mount Zion, when his enemies shall be put down, and his kingdom thenceforth set up. Hence judgments are generally associated with the day of the Lord, but never with the coming of the Lord, when reference is simply made to his coming in the air for his saints. When Jesus comes in flaming fire, after the gathering of believers, and by the brightness of his coming destroys the man of sin, it will be the beginning of that terrible day. But before that day, as already intimated, the temple will be rebuilt; for it is subsequent to its desecration, is it not until "the abomination of desolation," of which the prophet speaks, has set itself up in the temple, that the Lord appears on the scene. But prior to that, Christ will come in the clouds to gather around him his redeemed and believing people. That coming of that stage of his coming, will be one of unspeakable grace, and blessing, and joy, and triumph.

While part of Israel must be in their own land when the Lord descends with his saints, to overcome the nations that will be gathered against Jerusalem; yet any day or hour the Lord may descend to the clouds to call around him his church, or the body of believers. The author of "Plain papers on prophetic subjects" thinks that the judgments will not be the necessary preliminaries of the event of Christ's descent into the air. He thinks it probable there may be some distance of time between Christ's coming into the air and the judgments that will succeed. To our own mind this point seems quite clear. That we may not be overcome of evil, and our hearts be led astray, and that that day may not come on us suddenly as a snare, we are exhorted to take heed to ourselves. Ever since Christ's departure into heaven the Spirit has designed his coming again to be kept before the church, to invite it to preparation and watchfulness, from age to age, to the close of the dispensation. This is evident from the very frequent recurrence to the subject in the epistles: but the majority of religious teachers have grossly neglected their duty in overlooking it.

In Rev. xi. 15, 17, we have a prophetical description of the gratitude and joy and worship on the part of the four and twenty elders when the hour shall have come for Christ to take the kingdom of the world and claim it as his own, and begin that reign which shall continue unto the ages of the ages. "And the seventh angel sounded; and there followed great voices in heaven, and they said, the kingdom of the world is become the kingdom of our Lord, and of his Christ: and he shall reign for ever and ever. And the four and twenty elders, which sit before God on their thrones, fell upon their faces, and worshiped God, saying, We give thee thanks, O Lord God, the Almighty, which art and which wast; because thou hast taken thy great power, and didst reign. But the next verse shows that the hour in which this shall take place is the hour in which judgment shall be passed upon the dead, and the reward given to all the prophets and the saints. This makes the time to be the time of Christ's coming, for numerous Scriptures show that the reward will be given at his appearing the second time. But the time here referred to may include the whole millennial period, and the events that are to take place may span the entire period. And they may not be named in the order in which they shall take place. As R. J. Breckenridge remarks, "Christ's second coming is not a mere point of time, but a period beginning with the resurrection of the just, and ending with the general judgment." Yet when this takes place, when Christ takes the government of the world, the nations are to be wroth, angry, which is positive evidence that they will not be converted, and in peace and quietness, at his coming. "And the nations were wroth." Ver. 18. From Psa. ii. 1-3; cxliv. 6-9, it would seem as if some nations will cherish a spirit of rebellion, and that their kings and rulers will take counsel together against Jehovah and against the Christ, the anointed King, and that the saints will "execute vengeance upon the nations, and punishments upon the people;" and "bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron."

In 1 Thess. iii. 13, Paul speaks of "the coming of our Lord Jesus with all his saints," and makes it the ground of a devout wish and prayer that the Thessalonian Christians might increase and abound in love, and that their hearts might be stablished in holiness unblameable. But this coming, we are told by some, is not to take place till the earth is filled with the knowledge of God and all men are saved. Yet a little further on in the epistle, the apostle says, "For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night. When they are saying, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall in no wise escape." Chap. v. 2, 3. Now this unexpected coming of this day, and this terrible destruction of the children of the night, cannot be reconciled with the theory of a regenerated world prior to that day.

DIVISIONS.

Paul says in Romans xvi. 17, "Now I beseech you brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned, and avoid them. For they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly, and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple." Again Paul says in 1 Cor. i. 10, "Now I beseech you brethren by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same things, and that there be no divisions among you, but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment."

Yes, says a Bible student, but many are ignorant in regard to the Scriptures, and are stubborn, they will not speak the same things with us, will not learn of us, will not come to our stand point, and what can we do? What did Paul say, Rom. xii. 3, "For I say through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think." Vs. 10, "Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love, in honor preferring one another." Romans xiv. 1, 2, "Him that is weak in the faith receive ye, but not to doubtful disputation; for one believeth that he may eat all things, another who is weak eateth herbs." 1 Cor. viii. 10-13, "For if any man see thee which hast knowledge sit at meat in the idol's temple, shall not the conscience of him that is weak be emboldened to eat those things which are offered to idols, and through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish for whom Christ died. But when ye sin so against the brethren and wound their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ. Wherefore, if I make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth."

Now brethren would it not be as well, in respect to other points of doctrine wherein we differ to use the same carefulness not to offend or cause our brother to stumble, but let us with patience and love unfeigned try to lead the weak into all truth? But let us search deeply, earnestly and prayerfully for the truth, and be sure we have got it ourselves before we attempt to teach another, for there is a great responsibility resting on a teacher of the gospel. 1 Cor. iii. 3, 4, "For ye are yet carnal, for whereas there is among you envying and strife and divisions, are ye not carnal and walk as men. For while one saith I am of Paul, and another I am of Apollos, are ye not carnal. What are we brother and sister when one is a Restitutionist, another a Crisis Advent, another a Christadelphian? Paul says in Rom. viii. 6, 7, "For to be carnally minded is death, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God, for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be."

Paul says again in Ephesians iv. 1-3, I, therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called, with all lowliness and meekness, with longsuffering, forbearing one another in love; endeavoring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." Now dear brothers and sisters let us all take these Scriptures right to ourselves and in all things strive to do the will of our blessed Lord and thereby make our calling and election sure.

NELLIE E. HILL.

THE BLESSING, THE BAPTISM, THE PRAYER.

There three dispensational forms of truth are of paramount importance. "Their entrance gives us light." They are grouped together now for the mutual support they furnish to faith in "the common salvation."

1. "On this wise ye shall bless. The Lord bless thee and keep thee. The Lord make his face to shine upon thee and be gracious unto thee. The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee and give thee peace!"

"Aaron and his Sons (high priests) shall put my name upon the children of Israel, and I will bless them." Num. vi. 23-27. Yet in the record of 1500 years, this "form of sound words" finds no formal repetition! However the doctrine, the seed and the loving kindness of this blessing, remained in all its integrity and strength.

2. The baptismal form of words belongs to us till the end of our gospel age. The mystery to the Jews, couched in their high priest's blessing, may be disclosed in this gospel ordinance. Israel saw "the shadow of good things to come," Heb. viii. to x., but in Christ we have (and are to have) the "more enduring substance." Hence the commission, "Go ye, teach, baptizing them into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you, etc." Matt. xxviii. 19-20.

Note. This range of truth, "Father, Son and Holy Ghost," shines out in its incomparable splendor to irradiate the apostolic baptismal scenes with its divine authority! The doctrine is therefore analogous. This verbal doctrinal and associated truth of "the commission" gleams through Acts ii., viii., ix., x., xi., etc.

Note also that the objection to "the commission" ceases to lie in some latent disregard to "the Holy Ghost," however covert and varied this may be. Please read Acts xix. 2-6. The record of John's baptism is attended with a three-fold mention of "the Holy Ghost!"

Please ask yourself (your objection) why the old Roman word "Spirit—Holy Spirit," be more divine than our own emphatic Saxon-English? Can reason see even a straw here for faith to stumble over? It was a favor from God that "every man in (his) own tongue" could hear the gospel. Acts ii. If so then it must be so now, except to prejudice, self-will and unbelief.

3. The Lord Jesus prayed! The disciples saw in his prayer their need and asked for instruction. He gave them, doubtless, the sum of his own prayer. Matt. vi. 9-13; Luke xi. 1-4. This prayer comprehends "our age and the one which is to come," with the kingdom, the inheritance of the saints, and its glory!

Why quote this? I answer to arrest attention; to show the analogy between its doctrine and the blessing, the baptism and the prayer, neither of which appears again in their full "form of sound words." 2 Tim. i. 13. Yet they belong to "the book!" Like syllables in a sentence they are essential to its entire make up. They are indispensible. Their doctrine, their spirit, their sum of "good will to men," is maintained to the outcome of all at the end—the consummation.

The three-fold form of blessing may find confirmation in Isa. xlviii. 16, "The Lord God and his Spirit hath sent me,"—in the baptismal formula, "into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;" in the benediction, "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God and the communion of the Holy Ghost;" and to crown this testimony with a text on the level of sanctified humanity, "The God of peace, sanctify you wholly, spirit and body, blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." 1 Thess. v. 23.

The "faith that comes by hearing the word" takes this in without dictating changes. Its form, its matter and measure are divine.

The word of God has all authority. A repetition would add nothing. True, the apostles do not repeat the three-fold name in the commission, but they maintain the doctrine of "Father, Son and Holy Ghost." Acts ii. 26-38. "This Jesus hath God raised up, and being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this which ye now see and hear." "They that gladly received his word were then baptised."

The condensed record of apostolic practice in baptising has no determinate "form of words." In two successive cases the words are the same. In other two cases no name is used. The facts of teaching and baptising believers is recorded. Acts xvi. 30-34; xviii. 8. "The Corinthians hearing, believed and were baptised."

We speak of Christian baptism in this same condensed way, with no thought of disparaging "the baptism of John," or Jesus, or that of the apostles. The phrase "Christian baptism" is as definite as it is comprehensive, and throws our minds back to the Bible for all details. Thus they "came together to break bread," Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2, and this breaking of bread embraced the entire Lord's Supper service, of course. So as to baptism. Why stumble in such light?

The commission alone bears the form of authority, solemnity and completeness, for the work of the ministry and the 25th of the body of Christ, till we all come into the unity of the faith, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of the Christ." Eph. iv. 11-13; 1 Cor. xii. 12, 13. ("The" emphasizes both texts.)

This is to aid those who will have no prayer except in the closet, no baptism except in the one name, Jesus, and no worship except where all are head, by turns, to a few. Such will, on that line, prune away the personal and divine Sonship of Jesus; and others will not allow "the Father of the whole family in earth and heaven" a place or name in the adoption of his children into his own household. But let this suffice to hold our faith to "the word." Diversity in terms is not denial but confirmation. In the fear of God and love to all.

The above clipping is from the last number of the Bible Standard (England), organ of the C. I. A. It is not a typographical error as might be supposed, but the result of some of the error of Baal, which always has a tendency to leave the Creator out of his own universe. Yours in Christian love.

YE BELIEVE IN GOD, BELIEVE ALSO IN ME.

Such were the words of Jesus to his disciples. He gave them credit for being right so far and added to their stock of truth, and so those who try to walk in the footsteps of our Great Captain and teach as he did, ought to give credit where credit is due. His example was followed by Paul in his address to the Athenians, who took his text from the inscription on their own altars. And we in our day, in looking around at the errors that have involved and muddled the intellect of the world, can still find enough common sense to build an argument on; we can yet find a line of truth running all through the error and enough of sincerity and Godliness (and let us say Christianity) to give us root-hold for a fuller knowledge of the glorious gospel of love of God.

The time of proselyting is gone; let us now go to proclaiming not for the object of having a little circle of people meet in upper room once a week, as much as to "leaven the whole lump" of the world and the "church." "Ah," says some one, "that is a utopian idea," but the one that makes that remark knows not the subtlety of the working of the human mind. Even as it is our work has not been in vain. Truth is insidious; it works its way through the chinks of the soul's armor of ignorance and bigotry. Let us proceed fearlessly yet compassionately. Though the blow we strike at error is with a strong hand and a relentless heart, be sure that the sword is sharp and the aim true, so that if you destroy the idol you do not injure the soul that clings to it. Yes, you may be treated as a crank at first, but in time it will be different, for time will heal the heart and rot the stricken idol; so we may go on our way and find other work in the meanwhile, while the heart-heals and the idol rots. It is not necessary to believe that those who do not understand as much of the gospel as we suppose we do, are not Christians like ourselves. Godliness is a matter of the heart, but the early Christians had to be warned against idols and the late Christians have also to be.

It is charged against us that we compromise the truth by allowing that "the wests" are "brethren." It may be possible that we compromise what our calumniators believe to be truth, but which we take the liberty of questioning. I question if the world has ever produced more self-sacrificing men than some of our brethren, who have devoted their lives and best energies to the spread of the gospel, and who are in good fellowship with all "who profess the name of the Christ Jesus" and I doubt if there are more uncompromising souls in any "hard shell" community when it comes to a question of truth or principle. Yes, their lives do testify, and that is the best kind of testimony, that it is not necessary to be a bigot even if you know all the falseness of the glorious gospel and have the courage to board the lion of error in his very den.

Therefore, taking advantage of the truths that are proclaimed from week to week in Christian communities, believing then the human heart is not altogether base and all Christian profession hypocrisy, let us say, "They believe in God, they believe also in Jesus, let them believe also the fulness of the gospel." Let our duty be to purge their minds from misconceptions of our Heavenly Father's character and purposes and understand more perfectly the mission of his Christ.

The Book of Jobab, called Job, Son of Zare, Son of Braguel, Son of Hesau, Son of Isaac, Son of Habraam. — According to the Septuagint.

CHAP. X.

1. With my soul bowed down, sighing will I address my words to him.

2. Though constrained I will talk freely in the bitterness of my soul; and I will say to the Lord, teach me not to be irreverent; and why hast thou judged me in this wise?

3. Or is it a good thing for thee that I be a wrong-doer? That I abjure the works of thy hands, and heed the counsel of the irreverent?

4. Dost thou contemplate even as a mortal seeth? Or dost thou look at a thing even as a man seeth it?

5. Or is thy life a human life time, or thy years a man's years?

6. Hast thou brought my transgression to preliminary trial, and hast thou traced out my sins?

7. Yea, thou knowest I have not acted irreverently; but who is there to deliver me out of thy hands?

8. Thy hands molded me and created me; thereafter thou didst change thy purpose and smite me.

9. Remember that thou didst mold me clay, and that thou dost return me again back to earth.

10. Hast thou not milked me like milk and curdled me like cheese?

11. With skin and flesh didst thou clothe me, and interweave me with bones and sinews?

12. And appoint life and mercy to me; and hath not thy visitation watched to guard my breath?

13. Having these things in thyself I know that thou hast all ability and that nothing is impossible with thee.

14. Yea if I sin, thou dost watch to keep me, but from transgressions thou hast not held me guiltless.

15. If indeed I should be irreverent, woe is me; and if I be just I cannot look up! For I am full of dishonor. (The reader will observe that "just" in this passage, and generally in the book of Job, is used in the sense of "justified.")

16. I am being hunted forsooth as a lion hunts to slay; thou hast changed thy purpose and art destroying me in a terrible way.

17. Renewing again thy searching examination of me, thou hast used me with great wrath, and thou hast brought me to the torture-test.

18. Why then didst thou bring me forth from the womb and why did I not die, and no eye see me.

19. And I had been as one who is not?

20. Is not my life-time a little thing? Permit me to rest a brief space,

21. Before I go my way whence I shall not return, to the dark and gloomy earth, to an earth of everlasting darkness, where there is no ray, and where it is not for mortals to see life.

O. GARDNER.

Editor Restitution:

I have often thought that I would write a few lines for THE RESTITUTION, but have delayed until now. I want to encourage the brethren and sisters everywhere to work for the Lord. We don't know how much good we can do until we try. I started out last Monday morning thinking perhaps I might get four our five to take THE RESTITUTION three months. I got eleven subscribers, and my husband, who is a blacksmith and machinist, preaches the word as he pounds away on his anvil, and by so doing got ten, making in all twenty-one, and all in less than two weeks' time. Some wanted the paper, but could not spare the money, as times are very close here at present. So I called on Brother Robbins for the purpose of asking him for some help, and we both seemed to be of the same mind, for before I asked him he handed me a dollar and told me to send the paper to those whom I thought would appreciate it most or where it would do the most good.

Now I believe if the brethren and sisters would take hold of this work and make a business of it, that in less than six months this good paper could be sent to a thousand new homes, and only think of the good it may do. O, I feel to rejoice in the hope, at least, that many may yet see and understand the glorious gospel of the Son of God. I believe that the Lord will soon return to this earth again, not with a torch in his hand to set the world on fire and burn the inhabitants, but I believe he is coming to bless the people, if the type is true and I believe it is. I know he will come with a blessing, because when our earthly high priest went into the most holy place once a year to make intercession for the sins of the people, when he came out he blessed them and the glory of the Lord appeared unto all the people. Lev. ix. 22, 23; Heb. ix., please read the whole chapter. He did not bless a few and destroy all the rest. And we read that the earthly tabernacle was a figure of the true, and as Christ is our great High Priest now and has entered into the most holy place, that is heaven, making intercessions for us, at the appointed time he will return and bless all the families of the earth. The angels said that he should come in like manner as he went. Acts i. 11. In the ninth verse it says a cloud received him out of their sight. It does not say that he went in flaming fire, and we are not looking for him to return in that manner, i. e., flaming fire, but he will come in power and great glory. Matt. xxiv. 30.

Then the sleeping saints shall hear his voice and come forth from their dusty tombs immortal, for this mortal shall put on immortality, and then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. And then what will be their song? They can sing, O grave, where is thy victory? You have held me these many years bound in your cold embrace, and now we have come forth victorious. And the living saints will sing, O death, where is thy sting? Paul says, Behold, I show you a mystery, we shall not all sleep (or die). There will be some living saints when the Lord comes. Please turn to 1 Cor. xv. 51, and read for yourselves. The 57th verse tells how we get the victory. It is through Christ. He is the first that rose to an immortal life. Afterwards those that die and go to heaven? No, no. But Christ the first fruits; afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming. 1 Cor. xv. 23 and 1 Thes. iv. beginning at the 16th verse. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up, taken by force as it were. Two shall be in the field, one shall be taken and the other left. Two shall be grinding at a mill, one shall be taken and the other left. So the saints will be caught up to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall they ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words. It don't say they shall be in the air for ever. No, for they shall return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy. Sorrow and sighing shall flee away. Isa. xxxv., read the whole chapter, and chapter ii. to the 11th verse and see what the Lord saith.

Now brethren and sisters of the one faith, let us put on the whole armor of God and work with an earnestness that the powers of Satan cannot resist. Christ said to his servants, Go ye into my vineyard and work, for the night cometh wherein no man can work. I wish some brethren at Silver Creek, Forestan, or Adaline, Ill., would write. We love to hear from those that we have met and communed with so often, and hope the time may soon come when we shall meet once for part. "O, what a meeting that will be when our Savior's face we'll see, and all meet around his bright throne." Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR,

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with its Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other blessed truths. Also a hearty belief in the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THERE are some cares pressing upon us at the present time that imperiously demand our attention. Therefore we can not write editorially nor give that prompt attention to the requests of some of our brethren that we would like to do. Our circumstances do not permit our doing all we would like to do in some directions, but we will try to do what we can.

THE VOICE, a prohibition paper, gives the following timely counsel to the workingmen, which we hope they will carefully heed. Wrong-doing is not the way to accomplish any good design.

"That bullet from the rifle along the Missouri road, in Texas, drove a nail to the head in th coffin of labor. It will take a great deal of work to draw that nail out. Don't repeat it. The power of reason and the ballot are more potent than a million rifles. Don't unchain the tigor. Once unchained more poor than rich will fall victims to him. Success for labor in this country doesn't lie along the path of violence."

THE SONSHIP.

"But when the fullness of time was come, God sent forth his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons."

As this subject has been pretty thoroughly discussed of late, it will only be necessary to make a few suggestions for the thoughtful mind by bringing forward the testimony of a few inspired witnesses, and which we think bears on the above subject, viz., that "Jesus the Christ," although born of a woman, was a born "Son of God." If language has any meaning, the following testimonials can convey no other idea to the honest mind. First, the Father's testimony. "While he (Peter) was yet speaking, behold a bright cloud overshadowed them, and behold a voice out of the cloud saying, this is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased, hear ye him." The next witness we take Jesus himself, (John x. 36) in conversation with the Jews, "Say ye of him whom the Father sanctified and sent into the world, thou blasphemest, because I said, I am the Son of God." In Mark i. 1, we have the Spirit's testimony to the same fact, "The beginning of the gospel of Jesus, the Christ, the Son of God." In Luke i. 35 and ii. 11, the angel Gabriel witnesses, "That Holy One which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God."

John the Baptist is in harmony, (John i. 34), "I have seen and borne witness that this is the Son of God." Again hear John the Apostle, John xx. 31, "These things are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God." One of the most important confessions, and one which fully confirms all others and which ought to settle the matter forever, is given by Peter in answer to the question put by Christ to his disciples, "Whom say ye that I am?" Peter answered, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." These few witnesses ought to show that Jesus is the Son of God on a plane far above any other one of the human race. But we have other corroborating testimony. We will now take the chief of the apostles, Paul, Acts ix. 20, "And straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues that he is the Son of God." Also the testimony of the disciples as found in Matt. xiv. 33, "Then they that were in the ship came and worshipped him saying, of a truth, thou art the Son of God." Is not his divine paternity here proved, that is, he being an object of worship?

Next we'll see what Nathaniel has to say, John i. 49, "Nathaniel said unto him, Rabbi, thou art the Son of God, thou art the King of Israel." Read also John xi. 27, "Martha saith unto him, yea Lord, I believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of God which should come into the world." In Acts viii. 37 we have the eunuch's testimony to the same effect, "That Christ was the Son of God." And strange as it may appear the demons testify to the same all important truth (Mark iii. 11) "And the unclean spirits when they saw him fell down before him and cried, saying, thou art the Son of God." Mark v. 7, "And they cried with a loud voice, and said, what have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of the most high God." In answer to the question Jesus put to him, he says, "My name is legion, for we are many." We will give one other witness, Mark xv. 39. Those wonderful and startling phenomena which occurred at his crucifixion, attesting to the truth of his divine paternity, expressed by the Roman centurion is witnessing the miraculous events says, "Truly this was the Son of God." Read the account. You will see these fifteen witnesses all agree in their testimony.

Now we have only to receive Matthew and Luke's record of the divine begettal and the harmony is complete. Is not the teaching of the New Testament as a whole based on this all important truth, viz, "Jesus, the only begotten Son of God." "The last of all he sent his Son, saying, they will reverence my Son." "God hath in these last days spoken unto us through his Son." "The church is represented as waiting for God's Son from heaven." This language is all plain if we consider him according to the Bible standard, as begotten of the Father Spirit, that his life principal was not from the will of the flesh, was not drawn from human channels, and therefore was not forfeited by the sin of Adam. It will not do for us to question God's power, for you will perceive in the record that Gabriel has carefully guarded this point, in the very suggestive language, viz., "For with God nothing shall be impossible." The above is submitted for the consideration of the lovers of truth.

MARRIAGE.

"And they twain shall be one flesh."

The marriage relation is the most sacred tie that has ever been given to mortal beings to keep alive the flickering spark of life in a degenerating and fallen race.

In it, when properly formed, in the uniting of congenial parties, we have a safeguard to outward foes, a solace in time of trouble, a harbor from the cares of life. A word of cheer from the one partner in life will do more to dispel the clouds of turmoil and strife than from any other being.

Such a home must be founded in the Lord Jesus, and is but the prototype of that family of God, of which his Son is the head. Here those who have been born into that family do yearn for the "restitution of all things spoken of by the mouth of all the prophets since the world began," and the setting in order of that incoming household that is to rule the world in righteousness; when the sparkling waters from the river of life and the delicious fruit from the tree of life, shall shake the thirst and hunger of all nations, and kindreds, and peoples, and tongues; who shall be invited by the royal family of God to freely eat and drink, and live and give glory to him who "sent his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life."

Peace is rarely a component part of earth-made marriages. The child of God oftimes finds his worst enemy in his own household, or among his own friends. A sword is sent and not peace. But were it not for these troubles and trials we should never know the latent forces that lie dormant in our own breasts, and then the recompense of reward is so abundant that the afflictions of this world, though they were multiplied a hundred fold, would seem but for a moment and a feather in the scale.

Let all the saints thank God and take courage; and those who have disregarded their privileges renew their strength and brighten up their armor, for the gospel day is fast coming to a close. Heralds are swiftly running to and fro, gathering from the highways and hedges, from saloons and gambling houses, from the haunts of vice and houses of prostitution, such as shall be saved, to take the place of those purse-proud, high-toned, well-dressed, well-fed men and women, who felt they did not need a Savior,—that the marriage supper might be filled with guests.

How the Moodys, the Jones, the Whittles, the Smalls are snatching the brands from the burning. Let us not criticise their mode. If we can do it better, let us gird on our armor and take the field. One soul saved in the kingdom, is worth a life-time of toil in this age.

Find enclosed one dollar to be applied on my reading account. Would suggest that a few plainly written articles on first principles, or the gospel and its obedience, to be saved, would be in season, especially for the many new trial readers. May they see and embrace the way of life, for while they are on trial, while they make a trial of the new paper. Would also say that we have just returned from Sumner Co., Kansas, where we held some good meetings with the brethren and friends. One became obedient to the faith, while others were almost persuaded to be Christians. May the good Lord lead them in his own good way, cut and away from the snares and pitfalls of this evil world, to that happy Eden home in the world to come.

All praise to the Lamb
And to the Lamb most was slain.

While there we made a hasty visit to the Indian school called Chelocco school, which is a huge stone building on the northern border of the Cherokee reservation. Here Uncle Sam has fenced with wire a large tract of choice land for farm and pasture, where the native boys are taught the art of husbandry. And here at this school Uncle Sam is feeding, clothing, and trying to educate some two hundred of the native youths of the different tribes of all sizes and ages, from the little chap up to the teens. Most of them are of the native type, while some are white, and some few are red headed and quite good looking and intelligent. I should judge that about one third of this number are native girls, who are being taught to live and do like white folks do. It requires quite a corps of white folks of both sexes to oversee and train these natives. They also have preaching services and Sunday school regularly in this large mansion, where they eat, sleep, listen and study. The good Lord only knows the outcome of this experiment. We also visited and drank of the water of those noted Geuda springs and also those of Conway. The first of these is found on Salt Creek near the Arkansas River, where there are acres of salt marsh. These springs, being seven in number for luck, are close to each other, yet they all vary in taste and quality, some being quite salty. Many people resort here to drink and bathe for health. These springs are on the county line between Sumner and Cowley, some seven miles from the southern border, while the Conway Springs are found in the northwest part of Sumner Co., not far from Slate Creek. They also are thought by some to be highly medicated and health-inspiring.

Conway is a flourishing little village on the Ft. Scott and Gulf road, claiming eight or ten hundred inhabitants, and yet not more than two years old. It is a little city set on a hill whose light may soon be seen all around, for it is in the midst of a good agricultural country. There are a few brethren living in and around this little city. May they also let their light shine before men that they may see their good works and glorify our Father which is in heaven. Amen.

CLEVELAND, O.

Editor Restitution:

Duty devolves upon me to give you just a few lines of information in regard to the church of God in Cleveland.

For many years the church enjoyed the blessings of good health in general, and had but few losses by death, or removal among its members. But a goodly number have been added to its folds mostly by immersion for the remission of sins.

The past year however has been quite a trying one amongst the brethren, as we have already written you about the very sudden death of our beloved Bro. T. C. Allerton, and also Bro. Isaac Bipsey, in July 1885. Since that time the enemy has again and again visited us and snatched away four more of his victims from the little flock.

Oh how cruel a monster, He gives way to none, but has been permitted to lay his cold icy hand upon our dear Sister Eliza Kinney. For many years she was a faithful follower of the meek and lowly Jesus, being baptized into the Anointed One by Bro. Jobling, Dec. 11, 1864. For the past few years she has been quite feeble, and has gone through much trial and tribulation, but full of faith and hope, and having a strong desire to see our dear Lord's return before coming down under the monster, Death. She lay many weeks upon the bed of affliction, and for the last few weeks could not lay down on account of dropsy. She passed away to rest, Sept. 17th, 1885, to wait the Lifegiver on that glorious resurrection morn, when these vile bodies shall be made like unto his own glorious body.

Not yet satisfied, the enemy visits the home of our Bro. N. D. Selden who was apparently in robust health, and acting as a juror at the Court House on Thursday Feb. 11th, 1886:—but was taken quite poorly and went home at once. On Friday, at about 2 p. m. he was struck with paralysis, and I believe he never spoke again after that time. The writer was called to see him about 10 a. m. Saturday and remained with him until 3:25 p. m. when he fell asleep in Christ, Feb. 13, 1886, aged 70 years; he was a deacon in the church, and was very faithful to his duties and privileges as a member of the body of Christ; he rests, in full hope of a glorious resurrection through Jesus our Lord and Master.

But we must continue our list, for the enemy again visited the little flock and this time he bereft us of our beloved Bro. Edwin Nichols, who four years ago, with his wife, found it in their hearts to believe and obey the gospel.

Bro. Joblin then being up here on a visit from Murfreesboro, Tenn. He preached Christ unto them, and they were baptized by him:—Bro. Nichols was a hard working, prudent man, a good provider for his family, and we trust rich in faith and an heir of the kingdom. He was taken sick early last summer with rheumatism, afterwards the doctors thought it was cancer of the liver, but on a post mortem being made it was found to be an enlarged and hardened liver, of which he died. Oh, how he suffered for seven long months—and really wasted away to a mere skeleton—often begging to be taken that he might rest, for his pain was constantly with him.

The writer, and other of the brethren often stood by his bedside and longed to see him fall asleep. He died Feb. 10th, 1886, aged 39 years, leaving a widow and five fatherless children.

Thanks are due to many of his associates who visited him, and his dear wife, and comforted and tried to sustain them in their affliction. The brethren and many friends attended his funeral, when the writer was invited to speak a few words of comfort to the bereaved ones, and of warning to those still out of Christ. This was our third loss and our dear Sister McLauchlan the fourth, of whose death you have already been informed.

But while we have had cause to lament and sorrow, yet we sorrow not as those that have no hope, "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." But while we have lost six of our dear brethren and sisters of late by the hand of death, we have great reason to rejoice that some others have found it in their hearts to believe and become obedient to the faith and hope set forth in the gospel of our Lord and Savior Jesus the Christ. They are as follows:—

Bro. Harry Birchall, baptized Dec. 27, 1885; Bro. Vail, baptized Feb. 28, 1886; Sr. Emma Pate, baptized March 20, 1886: and still good hopes of more being added, and by the help of Israel's God will try and fill up the ranks as he giveth us opportunity to do so.

Yours in hope of eternal life.

News Items.

ST. LOUIS, April 9.—The strike in the railroad yards in East St. Louis is now a bloody strike. Seven persons—six men and one woman—are tonight dead and dying. A gang of several deputy sheriffs, who mistook taunts for weapons, cheers for threats, and a few pebbles not bigger than marbles for bullets, fired with deadly intent into a crowd of men and women. Then these deputies turned and ran away, and brought themselves to a place of safety in a St. Louis jail. So far as it is possible to learn the facts without prejudice, the shooting of these men and women was uncalled for and without results other than the violent and at one time dangerous inflaming of the passions of men who have not contemplated violence.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., April 12.—The inquest in the East St. Louis shooting affair of Friday last was continued today, and up to noon more than a dozen witnesses were briefly examined. No new facts were developed. All the testimony given was of the same tenor as heretofore reported. The witnesses were chiefly railroad men, spectators of the scene, and all agreed that the Deputy Sheriffs fired the first shot; that no stones were thrown at them, and that the crowd gave the deputies no other provocation for firing than hooting and jeering at them and making irritating remarks.

Five thieves entered a powder magazine at Colon, Cuba, for the purpose of stealing. During their operations one lighted a match, causing an explosion which killed seven on the spot and the [illegible] right wounded thirty-eight others, and wrecked twelve houses.

EAST ST. LOUIS, April 12.—The presence of militia in this city continues to have its desired effect, and no disturbances nor unlawful acts have been reported since the incendiary fires of Friday night, and it is now believed that no encounter between the military and strikers will occur. The same strict guard, however, over the railroad property is observed this morning and the vigilance of the sentries has in no way been relaxed. The promise of the military of protection to those who might desire to go to work today, has resulted in the employment of a large number of applicants, most of whom are not Knights of Labor but those who were employed to the filling of the vacancies caused by the strike of the latter, and who left their places last Friday after the fatal shooting by the deputies. The platforms of the various freight depots are busy with men actively engaged in loading and unloading cars, and no attempt at interference by the strikers has occurred, nor is any anticipated.

I ask no more in good or ill,
But union with thy holy will.

Behind the snow-loaf is the millwheel; behind the mill the wheat-field; on the wheat field falls the sunlight; above the sun is God.

Our faith is, if I must so say, like a burning glass, which concentrates the rays of the divine love upon our hearts, and focuses them into a point that kindles our hearts into flames. If we have the confidence that God loves us, in any real depth, we shall answer by the gush of our love to him.—Dr. Alexander McLaren.

Sorrow is not an accident occurring now and then—it is the very woof which is woven into the warp of life, and he who has not discerned the divine sacredness of sorrow, and the profound meaning which is concealed in pain, has yet to learn what life is. The cross, manifested as the necessity of the highest life, alone interests it.—F. W. Robertson.

PRAISE.

Praise is the only part of duty in which we at present engage which is lasting. We pray, but there shall be a time when prayer shall offer its last petition; we believe, but there shall be a time when faith shall be lost in sight; we hope, and hope maketh not ashamed; but there shall be a time when hope lies down and dies, lost in the splendor of the fruition that God shall reveal; but praise goes singing into heaven, and is ready, without a teacher, to strike the harp that is waiting for it to transmit along the shores of eternity the song of the Lamb.

AFFLICTION'S WORK.

Many of the beauties of the character are tenderest given by the Divine Spirit in the hours of affliction. Griefs, sanctified, soften the asperities of life; they tame the wildness of nature; they burn out the dross of selfishness and worldliness; they humble pride; they reveal to us our own weaknesses, faults and perils; they deepen and enrich our experiences. It has been said that "the last best fruits which comes to late perfection, even in the kindest soul, is tenderness toward the hard, forbearance toward the unforbearing and warmth of heart towards the cold. But there is no influence under which these late fruits ripen so quickly as under the power of sorrow. It makes us gentle towards all. Many a home is saved from wreck by sorrow that comes and draws estranged hearts together again.—Miller.

The Mystery and Horror of Death.

Zion's Herald relates that one of the most eminent physicians in the country was asked lately, "Have you ever grown familiar with death?" "No," was the answer. "I saw a man die today, and the mystery and the horror were as great to me as in the first death I saw in my childhood." "In all the thousands you have seen die," the questioner continued, "did you ever see one afraid to go?" After a moment's reflection he replied, "Never but once. Rarely is there any shrinking from life beyond. But there is always an agonized looking back at some work left undone! In almost every instance when I have told a patient that his end is near, he said, 'If I could only'—do something he had neglected while in health." How solemn

CHICAGO, April 3, 1886.

Brother Underwood:

Presume you are aware of the fact that we have a co-operative club here in Chicago for the purpose of purchasing goods for the members of the club. Similar organizations have been in vogue for some years, but generally they have been conducted without capital and by irresponsible parties. It is with confidence and pleasure that we can recommend the National Co-operative Club of Chicago. We are personally acquainted with Brother J. W. Wilson and Gen. O. H. Howard, both of the Farm, Field and Stockman, who are identified personally with the enterprise and who will honorably protect those who confide in them and buy goods through the club. The purchasing agent, Mrs. S. E. Clinton, has had a large experience in ladies' goods, and will subserve the interests of the patrons of the club with honesty and economy. We have known her for many years and can say that she needs no endorsement from us. Parties living in the country can get goods through the National Co-operative Club at greatly reduced prices, which will prove a great benefit to our friends who need to buy close. But as you are acquainted with the parties yourself it will be unnecessary to say more. I write this for the information of some who have made written inquiries. Fraternally,

H. V. REED.

REMEMBER

That we will send THE RESTITUTION to the poor, at their request, so long as we can get the means to publish the paper. Let all our brethren who have means to use in sending the good news to others, send us the name of some friend or relative, and send us an extra dollar, to send the paper to them. If you cannot think of any such persons send the money, and we will apply it where it will be appreciated and return blessings on the donor.

IN MEMORIAM.

Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. Psalm cxvi. 15.

It is the painful duty of the church of God in Cleveland to record the death of our beloved sister, Mrs. Robert McLauchlan, who died at Flat Rock, North Carolina, March 10, 1886, after a very protracted and painful illness. God's gracious mercy seems to have been brought to our sister while still in her native Scotland, and deeply impressed her with its simple grandeur. After coming to the United States her search for truth was earnestly continued; and as soon as she felt satisfied that she had a perfect outline of redemption's plan, she rendered joyful obedience to the faith by baptism into the saving name of Jesus, for the remission of sins. From that time forward the blessed hope of the gospel enabled her to live for the future, while at the same time she enjoyed a peace and joy in believing that the world knows nothing of.

Her kind and gentle disposition endeared her to all who knew her, both in the church and out of it. In fact it was impossible to be long in her company without discovering that she had been with Jesus and learned of him. She was frequently called to pass through seething trials, but she was in the habit of casting her care upon the Lord, who, true to his word, never failed to sustain her. In her last illness she seemed to spend whole nights in fervent supplication at the mercy seat. And to the fact that through life she was no stranger there, we attribute the serenity that pervaded her mind.

The funeral services were conducted in Cleveland, at her request, by Bro. M. Joblin, of Tennessee, who, more than twenty years ago assisted her in putting on Christ. He spoke to a large number who, probably for the first time, listened to the great truths concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, and were visibly affected by the story of God's wonderful love. That the seed may bear fruit, is our fervent prayer.

But we must bid the loved one farewell, till God's glorious Son shall call his saints from their dusty beds, when we hope to meet her and all the redeemed hosts of God and to unite with them in singing of "blessings and honor and glory and power unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever."

Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep.
A calm and undisturbed repose
Unbroken by the last of foes.

Asleep in Jesus! oh how sweet
To be for such a slumber meet!
With holy confidence to sing,
That death has lost its venomed sting.

Asleep in Jesus! peaceful rest,
Whose waking is supremely blest.
No fear, no woe, shall dim that hour
That manifests the Savior's power.

Asleep in Jesus! oh, for me
May such a blissful refuge be!
Securely shall my ashes lie,
And wait the summons from on high.

Asleep in Jesus! far from thee
Thy kindred and their graves may be
But thine is still a blessed sleep
From which none ever wake to weep.

NOT TILL THEN.

"As for me, I will behold Thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness."—Psa. xvii. 15.

Even now my heart is ravished
With my Savior's precious love
And, as hasting on to glory,
Daily I his sweetness prove.
Though He leads to fairer pastures,
And I taste a flowing tide,
Yet, until I see his beauty,
I shall never be satisfied.

Many a song he gives to brighten
All the long and dreary night,
Many a cup of joy he gives me,
For to me he has delight.
Surely, with such life abounding,
I could give up all beside:
Still, I'm sure, until I see him,
I can never be satisfied.

Oh, my heart, with grace uplifted,
Watch each fiery trial stem;
But to gaze upon the Victor,
Decked with many a diadem—
Him to see, the sweet drayinger,
Who for me once bled and died;
And I know, Oh! beheld Him,
I can never be satisfied.

For with him, I know, are treasured,
Harvest things, both new and old;
But his love, his heart's affection,
Choicer is than finest gold;
Changeless, too; than death e'en stronger,
For my faith was cracked;
And until these eyes behold him
I can never be satisfied.

Soon the day-dawn will be breaking,
And the shadows flee away;
Now, by faith, in joy and gladness,
I await the coming day
For I know my soul is safely
Hidden in his wounded side;
And anon, he sweetly tells me,
I shall soon be satisfied.

Let me tarry near his corner,
Cheering with his heavenly smile;
Telling me, in love's low whisper,
It is but "a little while."
Then forever, to brighter glory,
He will fetch away his Bride,
Then I'll shine in his own likeness,
And be ever satisfied.

Editor Restitution:

It is extremely refreshing to see so many letters from "the brethren scattered abroad" bearing unanimous testimony to the value everywhere attached to your excellent paper, which, like a kind mother, seems to unite us as one family and furnish all with good tidings of each other. I like the sentiment of one of the sisters uttered in a recent paper, "I like the letters." Not that the other departments of the paper are not equally welcome, but without the letters it would fall short of completeness. The excellent matter furnished, both original and selected, seems to leave nothing lacking to build us up in our most holy faith. Such letters as those published about Christmas from Brothers Young and Wilson must warm up the hearts of the brethren and sisters and cause them to draw nearer to the fountain of all their strength—our blessed Redeemer, a position which will best protect them from all the new issues that might sap their faith.

Everything which can confirm the souls of the faithful in their holy warfare is valuable, and I therefore send you a few extracts which I have taken from a book which has recently fallen into my hands—a work of about four hundred pages, by Dean Stanley, late Dean of Westminster, styled, "Christian Institutions."

When theologians dispute, facts are often brought out which condemn both parties, but which inure to the cause of truth. The result of high-churchism has been to cause the opposite party to look into the foundation of things, and thus as you will see by some of the extracts, to condemn both sides, whilst it is gratifying to observe that these investigations attest the truth of that simplicity of faith and practice found among our brethren. Whilst these writers admit, even boast that they have changed the ordinances of Christ, let us hold on to things as he left them, in which course even they, our opponents, justify us, whilst they condemn themselves in the concluding words of the preface, "Finally, two conclusions are obvious; first that which existed in the early ages of the church cannot be deemed incompatible with its essence in later ages. Secondly, that which did not exist in primitive times cannot be deemed indispensable to the essence of the church either late or early." Speaking of baptism he says, page 5, "Immersion has become the exception, not the rule. Adult baptism as well as immersion exists only among the Baptists. The dramatic action of the scene is lost." "Baptism was not only a bath, but a plunge, the entire submersion in the deep water," etc. p. 9. "For the moment the waves closed over the bather's head and he emerges again as from a momentary grave." p. 9. "This was the part of the ceremony on which the apostles laid so much stress. It seemed to them like a burial of the old former self and the rising up again of the new self. So, St. Paul compared it to the Israelites passing through the Dead Sea, and St. Peter to the passing through the deep waters of the flood." p. 9.

On page 10 he says, "There is now no disappearance as in a watery grave. There is now no conscious and deliberate choice made by the eager convert, etc. It is but a few drops sprinkled, a ceremony undertaken long before or long after the adoption of Christianity has occurred." p. 10.

"For the first thirteen centuries, the almost universal practice of baptism was that of which we read in the New Testament, and which is the very meaning of the word baptize—that those who were baptized were plunged, submerged, immersed into the water." p. 21.

"That practice is still, as we have seen, continued in the Eastern Churches. In the Western it still lingers among the Roman Catholics in the solitary instance of the Cathedral of Milan—amongst Protestants in the numerous sects of the Baptists. It lasted long into the middle ages..... And the cold climate of Russia has not been found an obstacle to its continuance." p. 21.

"With the few exceptions just mentioned, the whole of the Western Churches have now substituted for the ancient bath, the ceremony of letting fall a few drops of water on the face. The reason of the change is obvious. The practice of immersion, though peculiarly suitable to the Southern and Eastern countries for which it was designed, was not found seasonable in the countries of the North and West." p. 22. And yet he has just told us that the practice is continued throughout Russia, which reaches almost to the North Pole, and where even infants are universally immersed. He adds, "Not by any decree of Council or Parliament, but by the general sentiment of Christian liberty, this remarkable change was effected. Beginning in the thirteenth century it has gradually driven the ancient Catholic usage out of the whole of Europe. There is no one now who would wish to go back to the old practice." p. 22. (!!).... "But, speaking generally, the Christian civilized world has decided against it. It is a striking example of the triumph of common sense and convenience over the bondage of form and custom." p. 23.

The quotations on the subject of baptism have been so full that it would increase the length of this letter too much to give more extracts from the remainder of the book. These have sufficiently shown that men have taken the religion of Christ into their own hands, and adjust what they call his church to suit themselves. Let us try brethren to keep near to him and his word. So intimate and inseparable is the connection between Christ and his word that St. John speaks of him in his First Epistle, i. 1, as the Word of Life, and in Revelation he gives as his name, "The Word of God, the King of kings, and Lord of Lords." Rev. xix. 13, 16. Let us hold fast therefore to his word as the only means by which we can hold on to him.

The remainder of the book is occupied in discussing the communion, in regard to which he says the exact accord in the statements in the gospels and by St. Paul give no room as to difference of opinion as to its first institution; to the first church councils and the disgraceful conduct of its members, etc., etc., and to the clergy of which he says, page 213, "In the first beginning of Christianity, there was no such institution as to the clergy and it is conceivable that there may be a time when they shall cease to be." If, my dear brethren and sisters, we find ourselves by the admission of our opponents, walking so far in the road which Christ has pointed out, let it stimulate us to take to ourselves "the whole armor of God" and being daily "crucified with Christ," have him "formed within us, the hope of glory." In the midst of the convulsions which threaten our times, let us try to preserve "the peace of God which passeth all understanding," thanking him for the health and blessings which he has seen fit to bestow. SARAH MADDUDEN.

Editor Restitution:

Although not business manager—and this on business—yet I feel constrained to address you, because I have so long intended writing to you as "Editor," if only to unite my thanks and sympathy with so many others which daily flow unto you. I am aged and apt to defer writing as long as I can find a reasonable excuse for doing so. Your "Bible Studies, No. 2," in Dec. 28, 1885, answered the longing questions of my heart, if written only for myself then—it, "The Crucible and the Gold,"—could not have been more instructive, encouraging and comforting. I have read and reread and read to others until the paper is badly worn. I might speak of no article from your pen as 1 Cor. xiii., "Heareth all things," and others which I needed so much—but in this will be brief as is possible (to me). As the mission of this is chiefly business, which I have delayed so long from a combination of causes, that conscientiously I must hasten this to a close and start it on its journey to its destination, asking the dear Lord that it may not be delayed.

Your appeal to your readers at the close of last year and your offer rather met a quick response from my heart. "I did what I could," leaving no opportunity pass unimproved to get the three months' subscribers, but alas, my success has not been what I think I had a right to expect. Early in January I obtained one for which my heart was very grateful. A father of a large family, eleven living children, both parents professed Christians (Methodist), and not a religious paper in the house, not one taken and they in independent circumstances, as the world calls it, "well to do." But I was so certain about getting many more that I did not send this mite on and have the paper at once sent. I intend very soon (the Lord willing) to send on a list of names to whom I wish THE RESTITUTION sent. The list was made out in prayer just as I could think of the most likely to receive the truth, and lies on my writing table before me always and I pray over it, etc., and just as soon as I can attend to it I will forward the amount in P. O. order or registered letter. I also want for myself and for distribution many little things named in THE RESTITUTION, also for myself special offer of Wiley Jones' works. This I have long intended. My hands are very full and my heart too. Many years since I embraced the blessed truths taught in THE RESTITUTION. It being my chief teacher, therefore I love it. In addition to "the Word," THE RESTITUTION is all I require. It tells me of the movement of God amongst the nations, the rapidly approaching end of Gentile power, etc.

On this subject I scarcely can stop, and cannot stop working for "our paper," the only paper to us, and by untiring and patient effort (right living, etc.) see if an interest can be awakened (created) in the people around me. Alas for the people! I lived on a colony, "the Scandinavian," nearly four years. There were a very few other nationalities. They are well instructed in Platonic notions, etc., but it is for the children I am troubled. I am asking the Master to work here, and to teach others to work, and how to work and to be, and abide amongst the workers until some fruit for eternal life is developed. I did not think time to transgress upon an editor's time in the midst of multitudes of cares and demands upon it. Pardon me. Your fellow traveler toward the kingdom soon to be set up.

MRS. A. H. PARISH.

Editor Restitution:

Home once more after an absence of over four weeks. I left home Feb. 27, for Indiana; preached twenty-five discourses in Mentone. The interest was good from first to last, the attendance was large most of the time, and the order good. With the interest that was manifested we thought some would have obeyed the gospel, as we were a little discouraged till we met Brother Richard Rattlebank on our way home. He had encouraging words for us. Then we were assured that the work was not all lost. We had the best of help. Brother Rattleback's life and daily walk has been such in his community that he has won many friends. Sister Harsh visited the meeting and rendered good service by way of singing. I then moved on to Argos. It was the evening for the regular prayer meeting, but I preached to the dear flock with the best of liberty. Had the blessed privilege of shaking hands with a goodly number of the whole-souled brethren, which made one more bright spot in a pilgrim's life.

Left the next day for Macy. Here I preached eight discourses; the meetings were all we could ask, and may the dear Lord bless the dear little flock at this place and keep them in the love of the truth is my prayer. We then took our way for Plymouth. The brethren had looked forward to this meeting with no little anxiety, hence it started off with more than ordinary circumstances. We soon found that we were among good, live, praying brethren. It would be useless to say that they were well posted after such men as dear Father Chaplin and Father Barnhill had done a life's work in this county. But I would not forget the prayer meeting we had on Monday; it was one of the very best. I shall never forget while I live the sympathy, and earnest prayers offered to the Great Giver for my sick wife. Our meetings at Plymouth were cut short and I was prevented from going to Antioch, Argos, Fidelity, O., etc., on account of her sickness. The brethren at the different points remembered our expenses and cared liberally for our wants. Left the faithful band of workers at Plymouth with the promise to return to them (D. V.) and finish the well begun meeting. Brother Roberts took us to his home which is truly a pilgrim's house indeed. He took me to Argos the next morning. Reached home March 30, having been absent four weeks and three days. Preached in all 38 discourses. Yours in the blessed hope, B. W. WOODWARD.

I herein send two dollars to apply on my subscription. I can no more think of doing without the paper than I can without my victuals. It is all the preaching I have. THE RESTITUTION and my Bible are all I have to cheer me on my lonely way. Though I had fears I would have to give it up, I never before this time had to let it run so long over the time before renewing. I began taking it before it was called THE RESTITUTION and think every one who possibly can should renew as soon as their time is out. I am poor in this world's goods. We are here in a new country, near Grandview, Dakota. My age is 61 and my husband is almost blind, and we are both in poor health, but I thank God that I can read his word which is an anchor to the soul. I intend to try to get some new subscribers if my health permits. Hoping God may bless and preserve you in health, and THE RESTITUTION be more liberally sustained for the truth's sake, I remain your sister in hope of the near coming of our Lord. MARGARET HAYNES.

Editor Restitution:

I have just received the last copy of THE RESTITUTION. I always hail its advent with pleasure. Thanks to the donor of all good gifts. The grand old gospel has never been proclaimed in this vicinity. The people seem to have but little or no zeal for Christianity. Now and then a few of us can hear it by going several miles away. How I love to read these soul-stirring letters from the brethren and sisters scattered abroad; isolated, many of them are, walking alone, yet they are not alone, for those wonderful words of the Master just before he suffered, are as sacred to his followers now as when they fell from his hallowed lips eighteen hundred years ago, "I will not leave you comfortless, I will come to you." Every meeting we usually can or may realize the greatness of those words. We will never meet with the loved ones of our Father's household while we dwell in mortality, but some time in the sweet by and by there will be a grand reunion, not at the old homestead, but in our Father's house in "that city which hath foundations whose maker and builder is God." Only a little while and the long, dark night of Gentile rule will be dispelled by the brightness of the Sun of Righteousness. God's nobility will then be made manifest to an astonished world. The people will learn righteousness. Peace and good government will prevail from the rivers to the ends of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof will not say I am sick. Your sister in hope of immortality,

SALLIE BLACK.

Enclosed find one dollar to pay my subscription. As it is all the preaching we have here that is any way in accordance with the Scriptures of divine truth, we must keep up our subscription, and as I have been a subscriber to this age-to come paper ever since it commenced being published by Elder Joseph March, Rochester, N. Y., I want to continue it till the Lord comes. I am almost 72 and if the Lord wills would like to remain until the ushering in of the day of the Lord. I have heard our good Editor preach a good many times; he used to preach here occasionally years ago, when the Catlins used to live here. My prayer is that he may continue as our Editor until we will need one no longer, amen. Yours hoping and waiting.

D. SHAW.

Editor Restitution:

I send you one dollar for subscription for six months for R. C. Jackson. This makes 9 subscribers I have got for you this winter. Now if every brother would earnestly strive to get all they possibly could to take our paper it would prosper, and I think be enlarged and be self-sustaining. It is the only gospel preacher that comes regularly in our community. I hope and pray that it may grow and continue preaching the truth of the kingdom of God and eternal life through God's beloved Son until he comes in power and great glory from the heavens. I would be glad to have you announce in THE RESTITUTION the sad news of my father, J. E. Clark's death. He died the 25th of September last, strong in the one faith till the last. He said he had preached error 40 years before he found the truth of the one faith. Then after finding the truth he labored earnestly for over ten years to try to undo the great errors he had preached for almost half a century, but being so old he never was able to do it. He was born in Fayette Co., Pa., Jan. 20, 1795. When he was 6 months old his parents removed to Preble Co., Ohio., where he remained until 1835, when he removed to Green Co., Wis., where he lived over 50 years before the great and terrible enemy death took him away. He lived long on the earth, indeed very long. His age was 90 years, 7 months, and 21 days. My hope is that he will not have to rest long in the tomb for the Life-giver to come for the times bespeak him near. May we all be ready and able to say, amen and amen, so come Lord Jesus, come quickly, thou wilt save us. Yours in love, L. P. CLARK.

Being in Rayfield last week I obtained two trial subscribers to for THE RESTITUTION. I send you one dollar; fifty cents to be credited to me on my subscription, and the other half dollar to pay for THE RESTITUTION for three months on trial to the new subscribers already spoken of. I was called to that neighborhood to attend the funeral of Brother Drake's wife. Sister Drake fell asleep, as I trust, in Jesus, after a protracted illness from a cancer. Her sufferings, which were severe, are over. Her faith in God and his word was strong. Her hope was in the resurrection. She was a model Christian woman. She and her husband embraced the faith of God's elect several years ago when there was an "ecclesia" in the neighborhood indentified with the Christadelphians. This ecclesia was under the management of T. H. Dunn who died a few years ago. Dr. John Thomas has been there and lectured several times. I have heard him there. The ecclesia as a body is not in existence there now, some having moved away and the few remaining became discouraged. My subject at the funeral of Sister Drake was the resurrection; this was according to her request. I showed first that the resurrection taught by Paul is not the raising of the soul at the death of the body, not the reunion of an undying soul with the body, but the raising up of dead persons. Second that the evidence of the resurrection is in the fact that Christ has been raised as declared by the eye witnesses—the apostles. The house was full of people. May the time soon come when this glorious resurrection of the faithful shall take place. For this we still wait.

Editor Restitution:

The article in the paper of Feb. 10, 1886, from the pen of Brother John L. Wines is worth its weight in gold, not because it is new to me, but because it is truth—truth that I have taught publicly for about 50 years. I have seen the evil effect of making preaching and conference meetings regular debating meetings. Yes, after the services closed there would be a regular debate upon some portion of the discourse which was not in harmony with some brother's views, because there was something he had not learned, being back among the first principles, or the speaker might be there. And in the debate the old Adam would get up and close in what the bystanders called a "row," and thereby the heavenly influence that rested on the audience was dispelled, the labors of the preacher apparently blasted and his spirits crushed to the earth. Churches in this state and in Canada of our own order, for it is of them I am speaking, have been rent into fragments, and some are among the things that are past.

Editor Restitution:

Enclosed you will find two dollars which you will please place to my credit. I have taken THE RESTITUTION now for about twenty-five years in its different forms. I always see as a welcome visitor. We have but few defenders of the truth here in Oregon. I have been at a considerable expense twice since coming here by sending for ministers to come here to preach. They did so with the best of success, and after accomplishing a great deal of good, like the cow that gave a good mess of milk and then kicked it all over, their conduct did not become good worldlings let alone Christians. We have nearly all kinds of preaching but the truth. Infidelity is the most popular of them. Yours in hope,

A. J. DALEY.

P. O. ADDRESSES.

Those wishing to correspond with Sister Woodward, will address as follows: Mary A. Woodward, Dutton Kent Co., Mich.

Youth's Column.

Humility.

The bird that soars on highest wing
Builds on the ground her lowly nest;
And she that doth most sweetly sing,
Sings in the shade, when all things rest;
In lark and nightingale we see
What honor hath humility.

When Mary chose "the better part,"
She meekly sat at Jesus' feet;
And Lydia's gently opened heart
Was made for God's own temple meet;
Fairest and best adorned is she
Whose clothing is humility.

The saint that wears heaven's brightest crown,
In deepest adoration bends;
The weight of glory bows him down.
Then most, when most his soul ascends:
Nearest the throne itself must be
The footstool of humility.

The Story of a Handkerchief.

On the occasion of Mr. John B. Gough's funeral at Hillside, a little handkerchief was placed over the back of his chair, the latter being placed at the head of the coffin. The story of that handkerchief was told by Mr. Gough in an address in Cooper Institute, on the occasion of the fifth anniversary of the National Temperance Society, in May, 1870. We find it in the Gough Memorial pamphlet, just issued by the Society. Mr. Gough said: "I have in my house a small handkerchief, not worth three cents to you, but you could not buy it from me. A woman brought it, and said to my wife, 'I am very poor; I would give him a thousand pounds if I had it, but I brought this. I married with the fairest and brightest prospects before me; but my husband took to drinking and everything went. The piano-forte my mother gave me and every thing was sold, until, at last, I found myself in a miserable room. My husband lay drunk in the corner, and my child that was lying on my knee was restless; I sung, "The light of other days has faded," and wet my handkerchief through with tears. 'My husband,' said she to my wife, 'met yours. He spoke a few words and gave a grasp of the hand, and now, for six years, my husband has been to me all that a husband can be to a wife, and we are getting our household goods together again. I have brought your husband the very handkerchief I wet through that night with my tears, and I want him, when he is speaking, to remember that he has wiped away those tears from me, 'I trust in God forever.' These are the trophies that make men glad."

Man May be What He Wills.

The following remarkable passage was written by the late H. M. Grout while a student in college, and was published in the Williams Quarterly Magazine as part of an article entitled "A draught from vain philosophy's aye babbling spring."

"The desires and longing of our hearts teach us what we may be and what we can do. They are faithfully prophetic of what we shall indeed become and accomplish. How so? They are the measures of our powers and capacities. It is because man can become holy that his heart sometimes leaps at mention of holiness, and sometimes a lingering longing for it wakes up in his soul. It is because he has a sense of beauty and the power to imprint it on the canvas, and make it stand forth and live in the dead white marble, that the wish springs up in the youthful heart to become a painter or sculptor. No man ever had a genuine wish to accomplish anything for which there was not in store, in some shape or other, a fulfilment. Think of the wondrous achievements in science and art, and you will believe it. No man ever had a desire to become what he could not become. He can conceive of no excellence for which he has not a capacity. There is no degradation which a mortal in the frenzy of passion or despair ever prayed for to which he might not sink. The seed germinates, and as it first shoots points upward, so grows the tree, and the tall, cloud-reaching pine in but the consummation of the first unconscious upward direction, the development of the tendencies and capacities of the seed; and if you could remove the obstructions that lie about the soul's entrance into conscious existence, the obstacles and difficulties thrown in the way by others, the temptations and allurements which are sure to overtake every one in this world,—if the winds and storm of public opinion, of home and local influence, could be averted, just as truly would its youthful aspirations find an answer in the developments of years, if those were selfish,—in a self-idolized, degraded old age;—if heaven-aspiring and pure, in a heaven-reaching and virtuous manhood. The wishes of the soul are satisfied; its tendencies and capacities developed. Man's wishes measure his capacities and powers."

Dark Children.

The Word of life, which is full of beautiful histories, unfolds to us a pleasing account of a dear old grandfather, who had left his own land because of a terrible famine, and in his declining years sojourned in a place which name signifies, "That troubles." His son whom he dearly loved had two noble boys whom he desired should receive a blessing from the hands of the old man. On hearing he was sick, he hastened to come to him, bringing the lads with him. When he was told his son was coming, he gathered a little strength, and sat up in the bed and began to tell his son where first God blessed him, and the precious promises God had made to him, and also told the burying place of his son's mother. Then the dear grandfather looked upon the two noble boys, and said, who are these? and his son whose name signifies "Increaser," said, They are my sons whom God hath given me in this place; and the old man said, bring them to me I pray thee, and I will bless them, and when they were brought near he blessed and embraced them, but his sight was too dim to trace the difference between them. This made their father very careful that the dear grandfather's right hand should rest on the first-born, whose name signifies, "Forgotten," but wittingly the old man placed his right hand on the younger lad, whose name signifies, "That brings fruit." This displeased the father of the boys, and he thought dear grandfather had made a mistake, and he tried to remove it saying, not so my father, for this is the first-born, put thy right hand on him; but the old man said, I know it my son, I know it, the forgotten one shall become a people, and he also shall be great, but truly, he that brings fruit shall be greater than he, and his children shall become a multitude. Their dear grandfather, whose name signifies "A Prince" blessed them that day, saying In in thee shall Israel bless. He called upon God who had fed him, and the angel who had redeemed him to bless the lads, saying, Let my name, and the name of my fathers, Abraham or Isaac be named upon them. The chief father of the tribe representing the "forgotten" died in the wilderness, and had no sons. When the land was divided his five daughters desired they may have a possession among their brethren, and the Lord said, The daughters of him, whose name signifies "The shadow of fear," have spoken right, then shalt surely give them the inheritance of their father.

And from the younger son came He who spied out the land, and assisted in bringing from there the many ripe cluster of beautiful grapes, and who led the children of Israel into the promised land, whose name unfolds the outline of his character, as Savior, or Deliverer.

Your affectionate Teacher.

E. COFFMAN.

"AND MEN'S HEARTS SHALL FAIL THEM FOR FEAR."

Hear the murmur of the coming conflict—
Hear the cannon's boom—
See, uplifted high, the spear and sabre
Flash through the gathering gloom.

"Men's hearts are failing them with fear,"
Not knowing the meaning of the roar
Of the world-surf that, with impetuous daring,
Beats on earth's every shore!

Oh while we still the undertones of sorrow
Sob out the midnight cry;
While in the lighted halls of feast and fashion
We hear the smothered sigh.

The painted mask hides not the sad forebodings,
The prophecies of ill—
The clouds of evil, like dark skirts of omen,
Hover around us still!

Is it the lord-note of his preparation"
To judge the wicked world?
Roll up the banner of his record at mercy
Through all the ages unfurled?

I hear the tramp of Armageddon's millions,
The fiery charger's neigh;
The Russian bear, the Prophet's gleaming crescent,
Meet in the deadly fray!

Soon in the mystic "valley of decision"
We may the host behold,
With the dark blackness of the future
In lurid lights unrolled!

Soon o'er the mist that now obscures the present
The truth may be revealed—
The prophecies, so long but hidden symbols,
Shall be a book unsealed!

Then let each Christian work with hands unfettered
By slothfulness and pride,
For Christ may come e'en while the virgins slumber,
To claim his purchased bride!

And O the glories of that coming kingdom,
The splendors of that reign,
When sickness, sorrow, sin, shall all be banished
When he shall come again!

NOTES ON ANASTASIS.—NO. 6.

Here the author has discovered "a wheel within a wheel" in the resurrection problem he so logically tries to explain:—and he says, "But in connection with this extraordinary evolution of living beings from apparently nothing but a little incorruptible dust the question of identifying them as men and women, flourishing in society thousands of years before, has wonderfully perplexed the astuteness of the wise and prudent." But the restoration of the identity with Deity is neither impossible or difficult. The dead are historical characters, who lived and [illegible] law, to [illegible] law, that moved and had being in Deity. Acts xvii. 28. Hence all their thoughts and actions constituting their characters are recorded in him as in a book of remembrance," Mal. iii. 16. These texts, like most if not all quoted by the writer are sadly misapplied. Acts xvii. 28 reads, For in him we live and move and have our being. This is but one brief sentence from Paul's address to the people of Athens, whom he found guilty of worshiping an unknown God. Paul takes occasion in this instance to declare unto them that the true God is the Creator of heaven and earth—Yea, that same Being who even now sustains all things by the word of his power, and upholds all things in life. But he by no means teaches that all the thoughts and actions of countless humanity are recorded in him as in a book of remembrance. Mal. iii. 16 is sought for to prove this assertion: but it gives it not the least support. It reads—"Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another, and the Lord hearkened and heard, and a book of remembrance was written before him (not in him) for them that feared the Lord and that thought upon his name! We are not told in the written Word that the great Jehovah is a book of record! We cannot be too cautious how we use that great and Holy Name! The author continues, "Therein is written their history; and with the exception of their incorporeal dust in Sheol, their characters inscribed upon the divine page are all that remains of them in the universe." "This scroll of record" (Jehovah, the Holy One, the Creator of all things, he has previously endeavored to show) is the broad sheet of Spirit, styled by philosophers ether, and electricity, which, filling the universe, enwraps the world."

In the days of Job, when he was enduring his great affliction, and his friends knew not why it had come upon him, Job xi. Zophar the Naamathite said unto him while endeavoring to show him his littleness as compared with the great I Am—"Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? Job, the perfect and upright man did not dare to say he could find out God, neither have any of the holy prophets or apostles who were imbued with the Spirit of the living God to make known his will to man. But here we find a mortal, unimportant man—one of the sons of men—whose breath is in his nostrils, in this, the nineteenth century, boldly declares that he has found out God, and on this one declares he lies on page 23 of Anastasis. "The dead are historical characters, who had being in Deity. All their thoughts and actions are recorded in him as in a book of remembrance. This scroll of record is the broad sheet of Spirit styled by philosophers ether, and electricity, which, filling the universe, enwraps the world!" Here then this modern interpreter, analyzes and then synthesizes his own propositions till he leaves it as his testimony that the All-wise Creator is nothing more nor less, than a broad sheet of electricity!!! And thus he confounds the Author of all things with one of his numberless agents.

Who has ever yet demonstrated that electricity is possessed of any degree of intelligence or any divine attribute any more than light, or air? Where was this knowledge obtained? Did electricity call all things into existence at the first, and does it still maintain all things in life and being, and then stoop to become the passive, resistless slave of man, to go forth at his bidding whithersoever he wills. Away with such a thought. Let it be wiped out of print never to reappear! Can such language be deemed less than presumptuous blasphemy? Witness O heaven, and give ear O earth, my voice shall be fearlessly uplifted in the name of the great Jehovah, against all such vain imaginings!

That those not having a copy of Anastasis may see for themselves the utter vanity of these speculations I will further quote "All thoughts and actions are vibrations excited in this Spirit of the Creator, by corporeal agents. These subtle vibratory impressions are never obliterated, unless he wills never to receive them. Many such impressions he has willed to hold out; as in the case of those who are consigned to a perpetual sleep; and of sins that have been forgiven. But there are impressions, at present extant, that are to be intensified and made manifest, and whatsoever doth make manifest is light," Eph. v. 13.

All this vain speculation is only multiplying words without meaning. There is nothing in the Book to warrant us in saying that sins are merely vibratory impressions of electricity in the atmosphere. It is all a foundationless assumption without the support of one word of revealed truth. But by a multitude of words it is calculated to lead the unwary into a [illegible] from which it will cost many a struggle to get free. .....Sin is the transgression of law. Law can be recognized only by intelligent beings. First the law must be acknowledged by the individual and then his intellect must give consent the act. Where are the electrical vibrations in these intellectual acts. But he continues "The electrical and the electrically recorded thoughts and actions to be manifested are the hidden things of darkness and the counsels of the heart, of the just who have accepted, and the unjust who have rejected the light. These two classes evolved from the dust of Sheol, in the first stage of their raising are earthward and speechless. They may be said to be like a man merely roused from deep heavy sleep; who fails to realize his exact condition, or is in doubt where, what, and how he is; being in a state not inaptly called quandary." None of the inspired penmen of any land or age have given us the most distant hint that such will be the condition of the resurrected saints. No such doleful picture is drawn by them. Its source is no higher than the fertile brain of the one who concocted the entire scheme of mortal emergence—In opposition to the plain testimony which declares—Cor. xv. 52—We all shall not sleep, but we all shall be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed, for this corruptible must put on incorruption and the mortal shall put on immortality, etc. Note here, that it is we who are then found living in the mortal corruptible condition, that are to be changed to incorruptibility.

The dead are brought forth incorruptible, they need no change. Mortal life was lost in death. Life immortal is their next portion. Now the author asks, "What then remains for the establishment of these resurrected men and women, of a consciousness of having existed as members of human society, three thousand years more or less before? All that remains is that, like Daniel, their eyes be touched with the lightning of divine power. "He touched my lips, then I opened my mouth and spake." Here he asserts that Daniel was enabled to give an account of himself, as affected by the vision, before his lips that this electric touch on his lips, flashed the whole thing on his brain, and then he asserts "So with the just and the unjust in general. Their existence will be flashed upon their brains, being transferred thither by Almighty Power from the divine and electrical page upon which they are inscribed. So that truly of the dead it may be said they all live unto him," Luke xx. 38. All this theorizing is outside the word of life. We are not told in the divine word that any agency will be sent down to touch our lips, while we are bowed down on our knees and the palms of our hands. We are not told that that touch will act as an electric flash and impress upon our brains, who we are, whence we come, and what to hope for or to dread. Of the author of this theory it cannot be said as it was of the faithful and upright Job, throughout all his terrible affliction. Of him it is said, "In all this Job sinned not, neither charged God foolishly." He next claims that the analogy of nature is often referred to in the Scriptures in illustration of the deep things of the Spirit. It is reasonable that too one should be laid under contribution in expounding the other, because the beings to be taught are mortal beings, and the exponent is the Creator of them all. The explanation of the manner in which consciousness of identity is impressed upon newly created beings was suggested by the remarkable effect of lightning recently observed upon the bodies of a man and his son, killed by a flash while sheltering under a tree. A perfect likeness of the tree was flashed upon them. "Whatsoever doeth make manifest is the light." The lines and shadows had been imparted to the subtle fluid so that when it touched their bodies it flashed upon them a likeness, identical with the original; and thus the likeness was transmitted from the lightning to the bodies. All that is required in resurrection is identity of form or image; and identity of likeness: so that the intellectual and moral likeness of a pre-resurrectional man, be not flashed upon the post-resurrectional image of a woman. This would be confusion." (Note that it would therefore be in keeping with the entire view here presented). A little plain criticism on this last paragraph will surely tend to open the eyes of those who desire wisdom for her own sake. The author here frankly admits that this portion of the theory, the manner in which conscious identity is flashed upon the subjects of resurrection; he did not find in the Book. This is honest candid truth. It is not there to be found by mortal man. Well now let us see if he found it in the subjects of the lightning flash under the tree. From our stand point we fail to see any such idea in the case presented, for instead of identity being flashed upon them, life was flashed out of them so quickly and so completely that we have reason to believe they never knew the agent employed to do the work. Here was a man and his son in conscious existence. We may reasonably suppose in the full enjoyment of physical and mental health. They not knowing the danger that threatened them took shelter under a tree. The vegetable decomposition ascending from the tree attracted the subtle fluid or lightning, or electricity, which was superabundant in all the surrounding atmosphere. And the overcharge centering in that spot, proved too much for human vitality to endure, and immediately both the living objects were deprived of life, because unable to resist this overcharge. Their nervous systems received an irreparable shock and through the agency of the brain, the centre of all nervous forces, the impression of the tree, the largest and most conspicuous object at hand, was given through the nervous system, to the muscular system. We all know that it is on this principal that all unnatural and monstrous pre-natal impressions are made, viz., a nervous shock to the nervous system transferred to the muscular and sometimes to the mental.

From this brief criticism we see that instead of flashing consciousness on moral agencies beings, this flash deprived them wholly and entirely of both life and consciousness. Where then is the ground on which to rest this presumption? Where is the similar? Let the intelligent reader search the Scriptures and if it be not there revealed how identity will be flashed upon the subjects of resurrection, let it rest with the secret things that belong to God. Accept not uninspired evidence on either side, remembering that man at his best estate is altogether vanity and liable to err. Put not your trust in princes.

The author continues. "From this view of the development of identity, it will be seen how futile all human efforts to circumvent resurrection." By duly weighing the given view of "development of identity," it will be clearly manifest that the foundation on which it rests is but a myth of the brain and hence the superstructure is equally unsound.

Then he asserts as that "the enemies of the saints in various ages have thought to prevent their resurrection by burning their bodies, and scattering their dust to the winds. But the Lord in heaven holds all such enterprises in derision. Any other dust may do as well, the powers of identity not residing there, but in the character already formed being flashed by the spirit upon the new creature." The spirit of the living God in his revealed will and divine purposes toward our race, gives no information concerning the details of resurrection such as the "development of identity" and the flashing of the character by the spirit upon the new creature. It is not written in the word of life; and never should have been penned by mortal man whose breath is in his nostrils and who is of the dust.

Quotation continued.—"But in opposition to all this are the notions of the prudent who are wiser in their own conceits than "seven men who can render a reason." Their tradition is, that no such doctrine is taught in the Scriptures, as that the righteous have to appear before the judgment seat of Christ and give account of what they have done, since their adoption into the family of Christ; that upon such a principle nobody would be saved; because none could attain to the standard of acceptance, they repudiate the idea with scornful indignation, and say there is no sense in it, for if such were the case, it would put them in such a state of fe ing as to make them fit inmates for a lunatic asylum. They affirm that all the account, or confession the righteous have to make is now, and that their leap from their graves incorruptible and immortal is their judgment, upon which they are caught up in the air, where they are forever with the Lord."

In this entire paragraph there are but few words of sound wisdom or reasoning. Hitherto he has given no proof that the saints are arraigned before the tribunal of Christ, to each plead their respective cases; and here he offers none, but merely seeks to misrepresent and thus mislead. I know of none who hold that the leap from the grave incorruptible and immortal is the judgment. If they are not judged worthy of that glorious condition they will not be called forth to it. The judgment must precede the reward and the reward is immortality. [illegible] of any who hold that the [illegible] of the redeemed will be this. Except those who believe in the kingdom and glory of immortal souls. Next the author resolves this theory against which he writes, into the three following propositions—

1st. Mortal resurrection is not taught directly nor indirectly in the Scriptures.

2nd. The righteous are not brought to judgment.

3d. The Scriptures teach positively and without reservation that the righteous are raised incorruptible.

Let us give a little patient consideration to this portion of Anastasis. We have now reached the 25th page, and yet the author has not given one text, that can be made directly or indirectly to prove that mortal resurrection is taught in the Scriptures of truth; while I have given proof from both Old and New Testament, that the righteous are raised incorruptible and immortal. Turn to Psa. xvii. 5; Job xix. 25, 26; 1 Cor. xv. 51, 55; 1 Thess. iv. 15, 16, 17; 1 Tim. iv. 1, 2. To these very many might be added but these are enough. They are plain and positive. They need no systematized human reasoning. They are the grand presentation in simple language of the glorious and sublime purpose of the great Jehovah toward his faithful people whom he will in his own way and at his own time endow with the priceless boon of endless life. Let us not be found fighting against God in his revealed purposes lest our final portion be as it is written in Rev. xxii. 18, 19. Let us take the Word as it is given neither adding nor taking from. We read not in this book, nor any other divinely inspired book concerning the first, second, and third stages of the resurrection process. We read nothing in all God's revealed will of "mortal emergence" or of "development of identity," or of this identity being flashed upon reorganized dust. No, as it is all added to the words of Holy Writ. No proof is given of its soundness. There is none to give: it rests wholly on an assumed basis, which must sooner or later meet the fate of the wood, hay and stubble, that will be utterly consumed in the great, the coming day.

Kingdom and the Restoration.

Or, A Scriptural View of the Second Coming of Christ, with the Wonderful Signs that will Precede it, and the still more Wonderful Things that will follow it.

—BY SILAS HENN.—

NOTICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS:

The book is truthful, reverent and instructive, every way worthy of the attention of those who prefer calm argument to sensational speculation.—The Rainbow.

We are desirous to express our sympathy with the general scope of the book, and to bespeak for it a wide and cordial reception.—The Messenger.

The volume before us is evidently the product of a thoughtful mind, and deserves the careful study of every Christian, being of a very comprehensive character, and based on Scripture. Certainly it is the best work on the subject which has come under our notice.—The Sydney Observer.

The treatment shows that the author has studied well and patiently digested his theme before writing upon it, and we feel as we read page after page, stimulated rather than clogged in our inquiry.....The aim of the volume before us is to set the truth clearly before the mind, and so restore to its place in the consciousness of the church the hope that was once as dear to God's watching saints, and is still so to many, but which is always unwelcome to a wealthy, cold and formal church, and hated by the world. This little volume will be received and read with pleasure by all who take interest in prophetic subjects.—Rev. Nathaniel West, D. D.

THE COMING AGE,

—ITS—

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WEETHEE.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind among religious people, a new and constantly growing interest. Already the cry is echoed and re-echoed: "What are the signs of the coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound researches and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research, covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a characteristic style the remarkable manner in which a text has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents limited views consistent alone with scripture read with breadth. It outlines the events of gospel and prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the words controlling hand of God in the history of by-gone ages, and shows that the same hand is in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that the supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensation yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Omnipotent Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $1.00. Send to this office for this work.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief in the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for salvation.

GOD HATH SPOKEN.

In a former paper we found that the great theme of God's message to the rebellious house of Israel was a permanent salvation from disobedience, disease and death. The means for effecting this perfect cure was the hearty acceptance of the word of God. The very short pithy sentence, "God hath spoken," or the still shorter phrase, "The word of God" or as in Paul's charge to Timothy, "The Word," or in the words of Jesus, "The word of the kingdom," expresses in a general form what every one in a state of sin, disease and death, must hear and obey in order to be saved from the wages of sin, which is death. This word of the kingdom is sometimes called the gospel of the kingdom, and in other places, the gospel of the grace of God, the gospel of peace, the word of reconciliation, etc.

The object of this paper is to call attention to what a greater or less extent is overlooked by all who profess their faith in the kingdom and age to come. The error referred to is the limiting of the expression "The kingdom of God," to that state of the kingdom of God when all the heirs of it are invited by the King to inherit it and reign with him. Calling to mind therefore the Divine Word, gospel, message, or proclamation, "Repent ye for the reign of God, or of the heavens has approached, or come to you: it must be apparent that those to whom the message came were the subjects of the King, or sovereign in a state of rebellion. The first word of the sovereign's message is Repent. The other added parts [illegible] incentive or reason why [illegible] should repent, implies [illegible] the other [illegible] to punish those who continue in their rebellion with many or few stripes as their respective cases deserved. The proclamation meant that there was accompanying it, the power to give repentance to, and remission of sins to those who did repent. There was also the power to give further instructions to those who repented, and also the power to execute judgment upon those who remain disobedient. If these powers were not present with the proclamation it must be viewed as an empty performance. But the Divine proclamation by John the Baptist, was not an empty performance, for we read "Then went out to him Jerusalem and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan, and were baptized of him in Jordan confessing their sins. And Jesus went about all Galilee teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease among the people. And his fame went throughout all Syria, and they brought unto him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with demons, and those which were lunatic, and those that had the palsy, and he healed them," Matt. xviii. 24.

If to these be added the three recorded cases of the raising up from the dead we are furnished with a body of facts which place the matter at rest, that God's power to forgive sins, heal disease, and raise the dead to life was in active manifestation during the ministry of the Lord Jesus from his baptism in the Jordan by John the Baptist, and during the time of the apostles.

The number of the rebellious who repented of their sins and were baptised in obedience to the proclamation of heaven were not simply subjects of the kingdom of heaven, as the rebels were subjects as much as they. They were subjects who gave up their rebellion. They were reconciled to heaven's rule. They obeyed from the heart heaven's word of favor, of peace, of reconciliation, of light, of inheritance. They one and all were henceforth children of God, of heaven, of the kingdom, of light, of the day, of the life, for it is written concerning this matter that he came to his own (people subjects of his kingdom) but his own (pleasant plant) received him not, but as many as received him, to them gave he the power or favor to become sons of God, even to them that believe on his name: which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. John i. 11, 12, 13. It does not seem to me possible to give any other construction to these words than a present application. The reception of him who came to his own people who were in rebellion, cannot mean any thing short of their reception of their King. And subjection to the will, power, or authority, of the King of Israel is equal to being born or begotten of his word, of his seed, or of himself. But all these were begotten of the gospel, of the kingdom of God, or of the kingdom of heaven. They had every one of them repented of their rebellion and waited for the new instructions of the King as to their future behavior. Now as disease and death are the punishments inflicted by the sovereign upon all disobedient subjects without respect of persons, it is manifest that those who repented of their disobedience and heartily obeyed the King of the heavens, that these were not any longer rebels: but in the words of the apostle became the sons or children of the Sovereign. The healing process had already begun to take effect. They were in our language providentially healed, and the full effect of the healing already begun was simply a matter of time. If the subject of this healing did not rebel again there would no other disease befall him. If he henceforth walked in the light he would never be in darkness, if he henceforth never went over into the enemies lines, then he was no more under the dominion of the enemy. He was translated out of the kingdom of darkness and into the kingdom of God's dear Son. Voluntary, personal disobedience was the cause of his being in the kingdom of darkness, and voluntary obedience to the same heavenly [illegible] disobeyed from the beginning, and by that alone can the subject of darkness, disease and death, be set free, first from his crime, and afterwards from the punishments due to it. But the voluntary desire to change from the enemy's ranks to the Sovereign's side is not enough. No. It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God the Sovereign who showeth mercy. Rebellion was entered into without consulting the will of the Sovereign, and in like manner the favor of changing sides must first come from the Sovereign. Now this is just what was needed and has taken place. The Sovereign of rebellious man has come with a message to him who is not at peace with him containing conditions of peace. It is a message of health and cure to him who is full of disease from head to foot. It is a message of life to him who is perishing and whose end is endless death. As the message from the Sovereign came first to the rebellious, it is clear that it must have sprung up in his own mind. It was therefore the message of favor. The repentance of the rebel to whom this message came is not a cause. It is the effect of hearing, faith comes by hearing. The hearer that is the obeyer of the message of favor has not performed any act of favor by giving heed to the message, as he alone is benefited by his obedience. Every man therefore who is disobedient to the message of heaven, purely and simply prevents heaven's healing power from entering into his body as really as if he rejected the only cure from a fatal disease which was preying upon the vital organs. To reward a perishing drowning man for seizing a rope or hand reached out to save him would be viewed as a foolish thing. There are parents who reward sick children for taking medicine and the reward often does more injury than the medicine can do good. The reward which is given to every one who accepts a favor is the possession of the favor itself, just as the reward for taking a safe remedy is the possession of the health which the remedy brings. The words of the Divine message, said the bearer of them, are spirit and life. This holds good of them whether they refer to a past, present, or future operation. The words of the Spirit are spirit, and thus he who is begotten of these words has got them within him a living Spirit power. They are incorruptible words which live and abide for ever. Their entrance into the ear of a rebel will either result in making him incorruptible like the Spirit who sent them, or they will destroy him out of the presence of the Spirit, which is life, that he shall be as if he had never been. This word Spirit or life is that which abides for ever, and is that which by the gospel is preached unto us. It must be manifest therefore that this power, or by whatever name we choose to express, or define the Scripture phrase which was put into the mouth of John the Baptist by Jehovah, and afterwards put into the mouth of Jesus, was present in the world from that day to this.

Every one who obeyed the gospel preached by John, obtained the remission of his past sins, and became an heir of the kingdom of God. Every one who obeyed the gospel before Jesus was crucified obtained the forgiveness of his sins. Every Israelite on the day of Pentecost who repented and obeyed the preaching of Peter obtained the remission of his sins and became an heir of the kingdom of God. Every Gentile who believed and obeyed the preaching of Paul turned from Satan unto God, obtained the forgiveness of his sins, and inheritance among all those who are sanctified by faith which is in Christ Jesus. The Colossians were among the number of those who obeyed the gospel, and it was for them the apostle bowed his knee, and gave thanks to the Father who had made them meet for the inheritance of the saints in light, who translated them out of the kingdom of darkness and into the kingdom of his dear Son. None of these however have yet been invited to inherit the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world.

W. ELLIS.

THE KINGDOM.

Many truths, of great value and preciousness, taught in the Bible, are yet but little known in the church. The truth regarding the kingdom we believe to be of that class. "There can be no doubt," says Dr. Dorner, "that Holy Scripture contains a rich abundance of truths and views, which have yet to be expounded and made the common possession of the church." The doctrine of the kingdom, to say nothing of its being rejected by the world, is not generally accepted by the church; nay only a small part of the church, comparatively, receive it. Yet this is no evidence against its truthfulness. Rather, it is in favor of it; for Scripture has forewarned us of the opposition that would be against it. We believe in a little, while events will justify the anxiety and labor taken by students of prophecy to make known the things contained in the prophecies, and give warning to the church and the world of the soon coming of Christ. By many these efforts are not appreciated now; but we believe that events will shortly come to pass which will force upon them a change in their views. There should be elasticity enough in our creed to make it bend to the truth. The truth will not bend. We may add to it, or take from it, and so distort it, and give it a crooked appearance; but bend it we cannot. Truth is straight, and what is crooked is not truth.

That the kingdom will come, and that it is nigh, there can be no reasonable doubt. Events are occurring in almost every part of the world of a nature calculated to awaken grave apprehensions and fears. The times are indeed perilous, and yet full of deep interest to the student of prophecy, and full of hope and blessedness to him who is ready for the manifestation of the King.

Some very erroneously explain the kingdom to be the church, and the coming of the kingdom to be the extension of the church. For more than eighteen hundred years the church has been in the world; but so long as the church is in the world, she is taught to pray for the kingdom to come, which is evidence that the two are not identical. If the kingdom had come, we should not have to pray for it to come. The church is in our midst; therefore we never have to pray for the church to come. It is by the preaching of Christ, by the proclamation of the gospel, that we extend the church; but it will be the coming of the Lord himself that will be the coming of the kingdom. The manifestation of God's grace in infinite wisdom was determined upon before the world's foundation, both in the church and in the kingdom.

Then others err by thinking that Christ's kingdom is simply a spiritual kingdom. It is true Christ reigns now, spiritually, in the hearts of all believers; his Spirit dwells in them, controlling and guiding their desires and emotions; and when he reigns over the nations as King in the Millennial period, he will still reign spiritually in the hearts of all who obey him; he will be enthroned in their affections.

Many passages predict the coming of Christ as King, and his ruling in Mount Zion. "The Lord shall reign over them in Mount Zion from henceforth even for ever." Micah iv. 7. "Yet I have set my King upon my holy hill of Zion." "For the kingdom is the Lord's: and he is the Ruler over many nations." "Beautiful in elevation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the great King." "The Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob." "I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn unto David my servant; thy seed will I establish for ever, and build up thy throne to all generations." Psa. ii. 6; xxii. 28; xlviii. 2; lxxxvii. 2; lxxxix. 3, 4. "And a Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord." Isa. lix. 20. "Of the increase of his government and of peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom." Isa. ix. 7. "And one king shall be King to them all." Eze. xxxvii. 22. "And all the ends of the earth shall fear him." Psa. lxxii. 7. Passages similar to these might be multiplied to a considerable extent. Oh, what a happy day that will be when Jesus reigns as King over the whole earth! It is in his capacity as the Christ, the Anointed, that he receives this kingdom; and he receives it as the reward of his great atoning and mediatorial work in human redemption; and it is not to be confounded with his sovereignty as God, or as the second person in the Godhead.

In Jer. xxx. 17, we read, "For thus saith the Lord: David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the house of Israel." The Lord here speaks prospectively. The seed of David was not to be cut off. David was a type of Christ, and Christ was a descendant of David's family, and the above words look forward to him. Hence we read in Acts xv. 16, "After these things I will return, and I will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen; and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up." Jehovah will establish the kingdom; he will establish authority. "The prophecy," says Alford, "regards that glorious restitution of the kingdom to (the Son of) David, which should be begun by the incarnation of the Lord, and perfected by his reign over all nations."

The Jews Outside Palestine in the Days of Christ.

Professor Mommsen, the renowned author of a "History of Rome," has done more than any other historian since the time of Niebuhr towards clearing the history of the Roman Republic of the many legendary notions which had crept into it since the days of Livy and Plutarch. Within the last twelve months he has published the fifth volume of his great work, of which the earlier portion appeared so far back as thirty years ago; and this fifth volume contains a chapter entitled "Judea and the Jews," which occupies in Mommsen's work a place similar to that which is held in Tacitus's "Histories," by his very biassed account of the Jews, as an introduction to his narrative of Titus's campaign in Palestine. Professor Mommsen is looked upon among scholars as an authority second to none on classical subjects, and his account of the Jews in the days of the first Emperors throws a good deal of light on numerous questions that were never properly dealt with by the Gentile authors of the first century of the Christian era. From an abstract of Professor Mommsen's account given by the Allgemeine Zeitung des Judenthums, we cull the following interesting data:—

"The inhabitants of Palestine were but a small and by no means the most important part of the Jews. Even after the country had been regenerated by the Maccabees, the Jewish communities of Babylon, Syria, Asia Minor, and Egypt, by far exceeded those of Palestine in importance. In the days of the Roman Empire, the Jewish Diaspora, that is to say, the colonies founded by Jews in foreign lands, had quite a phenomenal character, and threw the mother-country into the background altogether.

"It must be clearly understood, that the nature of the settlement of Jews outside Palestine was quite different from that of the colonies established by the Phenicians and Greeks outside their territories. The Jews were an agricultural people, and their abodes were originally far away from the sea coast, consequently their expatriation was generally not of a voluntary nature, but was at first enforced by Alexander and his marshals. Strange as it may sound, the Jewish settlers took a prominent share in what may be called the Hellenization of the East, that is to say, in the gigantic movement which caused Greek settlers to found new cities of an importance unequalled either in ancient or in modern history.

"The most of these settlements were in Egypt. Among the cities founded by Alexander the Great, Alexandria holds the most prominent position, and since the first days of the first Ptolemy, who, after conquering Palestine, transplanted a large number of [illegible] Israelites to Alexandria, this city became quite as much a Jewish as a Greek metropolis. In fact, as far as number, wealth, intelligence, and organization are concerned, the Jews of Alexandria were successful rivals of those of Jerusalem. In the days of the first Emperors, quite a million Jews were to be found among the eight million inhabitants of Egypt, and their influence was far ahead of their proportion numerically.

"In Syria, the dominion of the Antiochi, the Jews occupied, more especially in the capital of the country, a position by no means inferior in importance to the place they held in Egypt. In Asia Minor also they had risen to such a degree of great material prosperity and moral influence as to incite the jealously of the Hellenic settlers. This is proved by the fact that in the days of the Emperor Augustus an attempt was made in the Ionic cities, no doubt by mutual understanding, to compel the Jews either to forsake their faith or to assume all the burdens of civil life. There were Jewish communities enjoying an independent organization, not only in the new Greek colonies of Asia Minor, but even in some old Greek cities in Hellas proper, e. g., in Corinth. As a rule, the Jews preserved their nationality intact, and also enjoyed a great many privileges and immunities; the only thing which they were compelled to do was to use the Greek language. In this way the Jews remained Orientals in every respect, except that they pandered to the preference for the Hellenic tongue which in those days existed throughout the east of the Adriatic, and which was encouraged by the Roman Emperors so as to reconcile the people of Greece to Roman rule.

"From the foregoing it appears almost as a matter of course that the Greek language became the dominant tongue among the Jews not only in their daily communications with the Gentiles, especially in Macedonia, but also amongst one another. The Jewish settlers in Macedonia were Hellenized in the same way as the colonists in Dacia, who hailed from Asia Minor, were subsequently Romanized. In the days of Trajanus, The Jews outside Palestine, along the European, Asiatic and African shore of the Mediterranean, would quote the Greek translation of the Septuagint, despite and along with all its many blunders, in exactly the same way as Luther's in many respects most faulty German translation is done to the present day quoted by the Protestants of Fatherland, not only as the authorised, but as the authentic version of the Holy Scriptures.

"At that time, the national tongue of the Jews had entirely ceased to be used in daily life; the place it held was no other than Latin in the Church of Rome, and of Slavonic in the Orthodox Church of Russia. In Judea, Hebrew had made room for Aramean, the popular language of Syria, which was cognate to the 'sacred tongue;' outside Palestine the Jews had given up the language of their fathers altogether, and it was a long time after the period alluded to that Hebrew was once more restored to us as a literary, but never as a popular language. Most of the important literary works prepared by Jews in the early ages of the Roman Emperors were written in Greek. If the language were the condition of the existence of a people, the Jews would have ceased to be a nation in the very first century that followed the birth of Christ."

THE FIRST RESURRECTION.

According to Paul's letters to the Thessalonians, when Christ comes the suffering children of God shall find rest, and Jesus shall be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believed, " Thess. i. 7, 10. Then the dead in Christ shall rise first, and those who are alive shall be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, and be caught up together with them in clouds to meet the Lord in the air, to be with him forever.—I Thess. iv. 16, 17: I Cor. xv. 51, 52. We also find occasional expressions with reference to "a better resurrection," a "resurrection of the just," Heb. xi. 35; Luke xiv. 14; [illegible] tion [illegible] pre[illegible] as the [illegible] ance [illegible] nekron, [illegible] the Paul counts [illegible] that he might gain Christ, and that by any means he might attain unto the "out-resurrection," "out from (or from among) the dead" (eis ten exanastasin ten ek nekron)—thus Tischendorf, supported by overwhelming manuscript authority, Phil. iii. 8, 11.

Against this translation it is objected that the preposition ek, with the primary signification out of, or from, at times is used almost without any meaning, when it occurs in composition as here, especially in latter Greek; and that exanastasis, if out of is included in it at all, may mean out of or from the earth, as the sphere or region of the dead, and hence the whole expression means simply the resurrection of the dead. But that such a translation robs the text of its true significance seems to us evident for the following reasons:—

1. The primary meaning of ek so generally and consciously clings to it, that it cannot very well be entirely got rid of, where some element can enter the thought as the sphere or cause out of which or from which the thing spoken of could come. In the phrase ek nekron the dead may be thought of in mass. Out of that mass a resurrection takes place. In Paul's expression, where ek occurs twice, the same idea is then strengthened, so that we have an out-resurrection, not from the earth, but, as he himself says, "out from the dead." A similar expression occurs in Acts xv. 5, where pharisaic teachers are mentioned, which according to the text "out-rose" (exanestesan), i. e., rose out from the company to which they belonged, the church, and proclaimed unchristian doctrine. Here Dan. xii. 2 may be considered. Even were this passage to be translated as it generally is in our Bibles, it does not contradict the doctrine of two resurrections, separated by a long period of time, since here, as often in prophecy, the element of time is entirely excluded. But this passage may indeed aid our interpretation, since it may be literally translated thus: "And many from among the sleepers of the land of dust shall awake: these unto everlasting life; but those unto shame, unto everlasting abhorrence." Here we find the preposition min, out of, from (primarily in a partative sense, as when a part is taken out from the whole), combined with the plural of yashen, one sleeping, a sleeper: hence many out of, or from among the sleepers, shall awake. The sphere from which the awakened come is the sleepers, the dead, not the earth. And since this is an awakening from among the sleepers, it follows that some remain who do not now awake, but later, as indicated by the connection, and as seen in Rev. xx. 5, 12, 13.

2. Whenever the resurrection in general is spoken of, ek is never used, only anastasis nekron, the resurrection of the dead. But the preposition occurs in reference to Christ's resurrection, I Cor. xv. 12, 20; I Pet. i. 3, which was out from the dead, and also of raising of Lazarus, likewise out from the dead, John xii. 1.

3. It is evident that Paul needed not to exert himself to attain unto the resurrection of the dead merely: for to it all must come, even the most ungodly. But he needed to be in fullest earnest in order to be sure of a part in the resurrection of those "who are Christ's at his coming." It is therefore of this resurrection he thinks, and which he calls "the out-resurrection, out from the dead," indicating thereby its priority in time. Thus the Bible teaches a double resurrection: one of the righteous, at the coming of the Lord; and one of the dead, at the final consummation.—Dr. Ebbrem, of Baptist Union College, Chicago.

The Fuegians are the lowest [illegible] beings in the scale of existence. Their language contains no word for any number above three; they are unable to distinguish one color from another; they have no religion and no funeral rites, and they possess neither chiefs nor slaves. Their only weapons are bone-pointed spears, and, as they grow neither fruit nor vegetables, and their country is naturally barren, they are obliged to live entirely on animal food. Even these savages possess, however, some social virtues. They are not cannibals; they ill-treat neither the women nor the old, and they are monogamous.

Dr. Edward Heckel announces his discovery of a tree in Central Africa called by the natives "karita" or "care," which, he says, is likely to replace the gutta tree. The berries of this tree produce a stearic wax called "britter of karite," and valued highly by the natives and travelers. The tree covers the vast tropical [illegible] Central Africa in dense forests, and after it has attained the age of four years it is possible by discrete incision to obtain from its trunk and larger branches an annual supply of about nine pounds of gutta without injury to the tree in the least. A good substitute for the gutta percha is much needed, in view of the rapidly decreasing quantity of the supply of gutta of a really good quality.

The rediscovery of the ancient and once-lost quarries where the beautiful antique marbles were obtained is interesting. An extensive quarry covering 2,000 acres has been quite recently discovered in the province of Oran, near the Mediterranean coast of Algiers. The deposit has been obtained by an Italian, who has constructed roads and commenced operations. The deposit contains giallo antico, breccia and cipolino, besides black and white marble. These fine colored stones can be laid on the wharf at Oran for about $1 a cubic foot. The beautiful yellow marble, giallo antico, has until this late rediscovery been unknown, save by the fragments found in Roman ruins two or three years ago.

GOD'S GIFT.

"Eternal life is the gift of God."

Not of myself, in deeds well done,
But by the blood of Thy dear Son,
Can I in future bind me fast,
And gain God's gift of Life at last.

I might lay down my life for men;
Might fill with good life's little span:
Be pure and just in worldly eyes,
And yet not reach the wished for prize.

No scheme, no plan, of mine will buy,
Nor earthly wealth, pass back on high,
My feet may tread the paths of pain,
And bear the soldiers' arms in vain.

For country's weal, my life I spend,
And am a pauper at the end!
May crown my rulers' heads with bay,
And untrue wife to pleasure pay;

But they, alas! can never set
On head of mine life's coronet!
That gift, as "Order's" secret chain,
Nor worldly wisdom, e'er can gain.

All, poor in Heavenly court must come,
Who have no part in God's dear Son,
As "gift" alone, this precious thing
Our hands must take from Heaven's King.

No "goodness" here has aught to say:
No "self morality" can pay:
Man's "righteousness," is worthless dross,
When weighed at foot of Life's true cross.

Man's stubborn will in this must bend,
To an All-wise and pitying friend,
Nor prefer love of Heaven's store,
But gladly take what none can earn.

All stand on equal footing here!
The lowest: the blood alone can cleanse!
The dead for all: the price is paid:
The victim on the altar slain!

God's hand, borne out o'er man's dark sea
The cause of eternal life can make!
There, "washed," "sanctified," and "freed from sin."
To Heavenly Home we enter in.

"In this country the sun rejoiceth night and day—Neither could they from this place so much as see Doubting Castle."—Bunyan.

In Christ I have a land all bright,
In him a realm of boundless [illegible]:
Each rising cloud tinged with his light,
Without a storm dissolves away).
I trust in him to gently lead
Where purest waters ever flow,
On daisies his fair vineyards feed,
While Beulah's breezes softly blow.

The sweetest peace keeps mind and soul
When Christ is dwelling in the heart;
Then sin and sense lose their control,
And all the camps of hell depart;
And Beulah's cleansing fountain bleat,
Shall wash me whiter than the snow,
The land I'll muse and rest,

From off the radiant summits viewed

Ascending from the stainless sky,
I see its gates and mansions glow;
Hope sings of glory "by and by."
While Beulah's breezes softly blow.

GEO. R. KRAMER.

A few Sundays ago, we had the pleasure of hearing Bro. Kramer preach, when we received the above beautiful hymn. Its title was the topic of his discourse, of which we give our readers an inkling from memory. He said the sixty-second chapter of Isaiah was a gorgeous prophecy of the "restitution of all things," when the Jews shall accept their King, whose throne is that of David, which was in Jerusalem, not in heaven, nor in our hearts. Although the Jews were now a by-word, a reproach, and a hissing, because of their rejection of the Messiah, and their land is now forsaken and desolate—so desolate that it would require a miracle to make it productive—yet "instead of thorns shall come up the fir tree; and instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle tree." Its overflowing abundance of fruitful luxuriance and boundless material prosperity, shall be such that "the ploughman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed." There shall be such "showers of blessings," that Judah shall "wash his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes." It shall be so populous that "evil beasts shall cease out of the land," and its inhabitants "all dwell safely in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods."

Judah means "married," and Palestine, in the literal land of Beulah, which shall be restored to its "sons," who are not Gentile Christians, but Jews Rom. xi.

"The mountain of the Lord, Mount Zion, which he loved," has been given up for [illegible] wickedness to be "trodden down of the Gentiles;" yet it is Christ's "peculiar treasure, hidden in his heart," and his eye is on Jerusalem continually. Immanuel's land has been purchased by Immanuel's blood; and in due time the Royal Owner will come and the good his claim against all rivals.

God will exalt his King on his holy hill of Zion," and give him the nations for his inheritance, and the uttermost part of the earth for a possession, ("the dross all put away," Psa. cxix. 119;) and the whole earth shall be filled with his glory. Christ rose from the dead that, as the fruit of David's loins according to the flesh, as a man, he might sit upon the throne of his father David, and reign over the house of Jacob forever; and Palestine will yet sustain the relation of the Holy of holies to the rest of the nations. It will be the Sanctum sanctorum of Jehovah-Jesus; and Jerusalem will be the metropolis of God's Millennial Earth. Because Abraham went down into his grave in the cave of Machpelah with a deed of it in his bosom; and so "the father of the faithful" will yet realize its possession!

For during his earthly pilgrimage God "gave him none inheritance in it; no not so much as to set his foot on;" and he actually bought a burying-place for his dead, in his own land! Nevertheless his "everlasting possession," is inalienable! a possession that is everlasting must be future.

The promises of a material nature which are made to the Jews, cannot be applied to the Christian church; any more than our spiritual blessings can be applied to the natural Israel. God's word cannot be broken, and his covenants as to the land will be redeemed as sacredly as his spiritual promises. Although his "fellow citizens" of the Jewish nation rejected their Messiah, and "sent after him a message" that they would not have "this man" to rule over them, and will continue to reject him "until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled;" yet he says, "I will go and return to my place till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face. The children of Israel shall remain many days without a King,—but "afterward shall they return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king; and shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days," then "the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously."

These are but a part of Brother Kramer's remarks. In closing, he spoke of the church as the espoused bride of Christ, and said that Jewish espousals bound the parties as soundly as a marriage ceremony. We are now Christ's espoused people, and will be married to him when he comes to claim his Bride! The bride merges her name in that of her husband's, and we are baptized into the name of Jesus. If we do not lose ourselves in him we shall not be found in him, nor acknowledged by him when he comes to claim from the earth "his own." The reproach as well as the reputation—the name and wealth of the husband, is shared by the wife; so, when we espouse Christ, or he chooses us, not only his glory, but his reproach is ours; but if we suffer we shall also reign with him."

Of all the bliss on earth there is none like that of wedded love. Sensualists have no idea whatever of it. Platonic love cannot create contentment. The love essential to happiness is Beulah-love. Christ's service is a "yoke," but where love reigns it is transformed into wings which we rejoice to use in showing our beloved how much we love him. "'Tis love that makes our willing feet in swift obedience move."

The loving bride, the obedient servant, or the affectionate child, welcome the loved one; because it is the consummation of their hopes. And thus will it be with Israel and Jerusalem when her God shall rejoice over her, and her "land shall be married." Isa. lxii. 1-5. And the nations of the earth shall fear and tremble for all the good and for all the prosperity that he shall procure into it. Jer. xxxiii. 9-10.

JOHN A. GRAY.

P. S.—This report was made for another paper; and now is sent to me to review and send to THE RESTITUTION. J. B. C.

Editor Restitution:

Let me say to the dear brethren scattered abroad that I am still in the field doing some labor in the Lord's vineyard, gathering some into the flock. And a better time never was to hold forth the word of life to a dying race. All classes of religious people are searching for the truth. I have just returned from Lynn Co., Kan. Three more have put on Christ by baptism and I never saw a better interest than there was at Pleasanton. All were eager to hear the truth. People are getting tired of this hell fire doctrine and are seeking for something better. They want to hear the good news or glad tidings of a coming kingdom, in which Jesus will rule the world in righteousness, in which all nations, all families and all kindreds of the nations shall be blessed. Oh, what a glorious time that will be, when we shall meet all the good of all ages, and all our friends who have overcome, and Jesus our elder brother, the one that showed the nail prints in his hands and the spear wound in his side, the one that said to his disciples, touch and handle me, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as you see me have; the one that said, I am he that liveth but was dead, but now I am alive forevermore and have the keys of death and hell, amen.

Well, I have got one more three month's subscriber. I could not promise them to go back there any more as I am too poor a man and am considerable in debt, and they are also poor up there. Well, it will soon be reversed. The poor are the heirs of the kingdom, so James says, James ii. 5, and in the 5th chapter of James, verses 1 to 7, he says, go to now ye rich men, weep and howl, for your miseries which shall come upon you. Well, I fear that will hit some of our own dear brethren, some that have their gold and silver hid away and loan it out for from 10 to 24 per cent. interest, and that too to their poor brethren. Oh, brethren, how long will you keep back a part of the Lord's money. Why not let your money do some preaching? Either go out yourselves or send some one out to preach for you. I know several brethren who are able to set THE RESTITUTION on a clear basis, pay off all of its indebtedness and send it to quite a number of new persons that are hungering and thirsting for the truth, and help those that labor in word and doctrine.

Now brethren read carefully and prayerfully the 5th chapter of James and also Luke xxi. from the 24th verse to the end of the chapter, and especially the 32nd verse. The end of Gentile times is just upon us, and as Paul said, But ye brethren are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief. Oh, brethren, are you waiting and watching when the Lord will come, or are you up and a doing, that is, hoarding up money for the last day? Well, it is yours to do with as it seemeth best. Paul saith the love of money is the root of all evil. If that is true be careful what you are doing, how you handle the Lord's money, whether you will lay it up for the last day or put it to good use so it will do some poor sinner good in the way of preaching the truth to him, and by the way of sending out THE RESTITUTION to many new places, and in the way of making our Editor and Brother Underwood happy to know that the paper is out of debt and they are paid for their labor. Oh, brethren, a few more sermons at most will end my preaching, I think; I am not begging, I am not complaining, no, never, for we are nearer home to-day than ever before. Pray for me that I may ever hold out to the end is my prayer. JOHN FOOKS.

Editor Restitution:

With heartfelt thanks to you for your constant favor in sending us your valuable RESTITUTION, we ask God to bless you for remembering the poor and afflicted. Oh praise the Lord for his living word, it is indeed manna from heaven. How thankful we are for those precious columns from C. Colegrove and Miss Hone. God bless them for feeding us with the precious truths of the Lord. May they not lay down their pen. When we come into our Lord's kingdom they will rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory. We can well afford to bear our trials when we have such love bestowed on us. We enclose a small mite, the Lord will give more. Yours in hope.

THE ORIENT.

SELECTED PARAGRAPHS.

The Eastern Question continues a source of apprehension in European cabinets. The European correspondent of the New York Times, who has special information, adheres to the opinion he has held throughout the trouble, that it will not be settled without a great war. He cables as follows to his journal: "Nobody on the continent professes any longer to be confident of peace. It seems to be taken for granted everywhere that war is inevitable. The only question is whether it will be the last despairing stand of the small nationalities against the big empires, or a conflict between the Titans themselves. Greece is not so foolish in all this affair as she seems to be. Her actions all have a method in their madness. She counts on uprisings all over the Turkish Empire which will take up so much of the Turkish Army that she can easily whip the rest, and moreover, she relies on Russian aid. Meanwhile the Russian papers are openly declaring that the Czar's visit to the Crimea means overt action, the first step of which will be the forcible deposition of Prince Alexander of Battenberg. Even more interesting is the fact that the Berlin press is beginning to show its teeth in defence of the Prince, which is held to mean that Germany is preparing to take an active part in the affair as the protector of Bulgaria." France also has refused to join the coercion of Greece.

The political situation in Eastern Europe is like a troubled sea, which cannot rest. Greece is causing much trouble by her refusal to sit still and be quiet. The foreign squadrons, which are ready to administer discipline to her on her first actual aggression, are being reinforced. Russia orders back her fleet to Suda Bay. France dispatches "the third naval division" to the Levant, two ironclads having already left Toulon, and the torpedo flotilla being under orders. The British Admiralty sends "four more torpedo boats" to the Mediterranean, while half a dozen Austrian torpedo boats are also on the way "to assist the Powers in making an effective blockade, should Greece continue refractory." Meanwhile Greece seems to be the least disturbed of all the nations, and possibly enjoys the stir she is causing. As a maniac holding a lighted taper and standing in close proximity, to a powder magazine on board ship, would cause grave anxiety from atom to atom of the vessel, so Greece is keeping all Europe in a state of nervous agitation. None of the Powers can tell what the pugnacious little nation may not do next. Russia finds Prince Alexander refractory, and would, no doubt, make his conduct a pretext for a disturbance could she be sure Germany would be a silent witness of her proceedings.

The Greek Government has called out its reserves. Greece claims that the boundary established by the treaty of Berlin has never been acknowledged by Turkey. Sir Horace Rumbold, the British Minister of Greece, has been ordered to join with the other foreign diplomatic representatives at Athens in sending to the Greek Government a final strong remonstrance against Greece's warlike attitude. This remonstrance will be tantamount to an ultimatum; and if Greece ignores it the foreign fleets will act forthwith. All the foreign squadrons in the waters of Greece are hastily being reinforced. The French Government has given orders to the immediate dispatch of the third naval division to the Levant. The ironclads "Marengo" and "Vauban" will leave Toulon tonight. The torpedo flotilla is also under orders. The leading French newspapers take a gloomy view of the situation in the East. The Journal de St. Petersbourg says that the Russian fleet will return to Suda Bay. Count von Wolkenstein-Trosburg, Austrian Ambassador has left Russia. He has "gone abroad," the official announcement says. The steel torpedo ram "Polyphemus" is flying out hastily at Devonport, England. She has been ordered to Suda Bay.

It is reported that Russia has informed the Powers of her intention to occupy Bulgaria in the event of Prince Alexander's final refusal to accept the Governorship of Roumelia for five years only. Prince Alexander refuses absolutely to submit to the powers, as demanded by Russia, the question whether his title to Governor of Eastern Roumelia is for life, as he claims, or, as Russia contends, for the term of five years. The Bulgarian papers applaud the attitude of the Prince. They allude to it in a defiant way, and summon Russia to "set forthwith, if she thinks she is aggrieved." The Balkan Conference will appoint Prince Alexander Governor of Eastern Roumelia for five years, ignoring the Prince's refusal to accept the appointment for that term.

The Book of the Ages.

The Bible has held its place in the world longer than any other book. It has passed through innumerable revolutions in government, in philosophy, in manners, customs, and laws. It has made its way through monarchies, aristocracies, republics, democracies. When Aristotle yielded to Plato in philosophy, when Ptolemy yielded to Copernicus in astronomy, when Turretin and Heidegger yielded to Luther and Calvin in theology, the Bible kept right on. When Nineveh and Babylon fell, the Bible stood, and was controlling the minds of men when Tyre was mistress of the seas; but when Tyre stood the fisherman spreads his nets on a bare rock, while the Bible has gone on growing in power with all the years that have gnawed to powder the ruins of these once mighty cities. Long before Hesiod and Homer sung, when savage men roamed over the Seven Hills on the Tiber, and not a hut stood where the proud empire of the Cæsars grew to be master of the world, then the Old Testament Bible was throwing its branching roots down deep into the everlasting consciousness of upgrowing humanity. From that day to this it has survived the united attacks of all haters of its pure principles, its lofty morals, its stern precepts. Every method of assault has been tried and exhausted. Voltaire and Paine have sworn at it. Hume and Gibbon have sneered at it. Romanists have burnt it by the cords. Skeptics, atheists, spiritualists, have hated and denounced it. Enthusiasts have misinterpreted it, false science has belabored it with mastodon and megatherium skeletons, and worst of all, its own professed friends have neglected it and lived false to its admitted claims, and thus have done more to bring it into disrepute than all its worst enemies put together, and yet it lives and goes down deeper in the affections of the struggling of all nations as time and struggles go on. It is translated into more languages than any other book; it has been transcribed more frequently than any other book, more frequently printed than any other book. More art of embellishment, more study of scholarship have been expended on it than any other book. It lies on more tables of intelligent people, and is read by more thinking, thirsty minds today than is any other book. More cultivated minds are today employed in defending and illustrating it than on any other book; more presses are printing it, more ships are carrying it today than in any former age, and it is working more influentially among the nations today, changing laws, customs, manners, originating institutions of learning, of charity, than ever before. Within your memory and mine it has broken more chains, lifted up more crushed hearts, than in any century since the first book was written. It is doing more today to elevate woman, and with her all that depends on her, that all other books and influences together. Today, if the choice were left you and all people like you in the world, whether to give up the Bible or every other book in all the libraries of the world, you would with one voice say, let others go, but spare us the Bible. You would cling to it if Byron and Milton and Shakespeare, and Longfellow and Whittier were to go to the flames, yea, even if houses and cattle and lands, and banks and railroads were to go together to ruin, you would let them go, but cling to your Bible, and out of its full treasures you would reconstruct your fortunes. Such is the real position of this wonderful Book of books in human estimation today. Today, after only eighteen hundred years of trial, 350,000,000 of people have accepted the Bible as their book of religion, and, borne up by its precious promises, a million martyrs have embraced the flames, and millions more are today walking in the highways of holiness, borne through life's trials and triumphs by its holy inspiration. Now, how can you explain these facts, except on the hypothesis that there is something above human intelligence in the authorship of the Bible? It goes right on with the advancing ages, suited to them all and always ahead of the foremost age. Only the divine mind can thus reach forward, comprehend, and lead the human hosts.—D. E. Maxson, D. D., in Sabbath Recorder.

OBITUARY.

FAIRLEY.—Brother Cornelius A. Fairly died January 26, 1886.

This worthy brother was a long and patient sufferer, having been unable to perform any kind of labor for more than 12 months just preceding his last illness. He never murmured or complained, but trusted in the strong arm of the Life Giver's promises. His faith was rooted and grounded in "Life only in Christ" by a resurrection from the death state. He often spoke of the death of Christ, that if Christ be not raised then is our faith vain. No hope if the Life Giver died not.

J. E. CALLAWAY.

LENT.—Fell asleep in Jesus, the Life Giver, at Suspension Bridge, N. Y., March 30, 1886, Brother Callahan Lent, aged 77 years, 2 months and 20 days.

Brother Lent was born in Hamilton Township, Ontario, Canada. Subsequent to his marriage he settled in the township of Clarke. He and his beloved wife, who fell asleep in Jesus some thirty years ago, were among the '43-44 veterans of the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. But he did not take the position upon the passing of the time that some have that they had learnt it all. No, this was not the make-up of my Brother L, therefore he was a learner during his day of trial. Hence he was a firm believer in the restitution of all things foretold by the prophets of Israel. He believed that Israel's restoration embraced the whole house of Israel, both the dead and the living, (Ezek. xxxvii.) and that in the ages to come they would be the head of all nations, and the nations that will not bow to them and their King, Jesus, will be destroyed.

Brother Lent's house was always a home for those who were preaching the gospel, the kingdom of God, and a place where meetings were held for many years occasionally. Some ten years ago he sold his farm in C. and moved to Townsendville. Three years ago last fall he sold his home in B. and moved to this place. It is about 27 years since I first became acquainted with Brother L. and his family, and our union from that time to the day of his death has been similar to that of David and Jonathan. His two daughters and three sons and two of their wives were immersed by the writer and are of the one faith and hope. Brother L. was a good man; he was a family man. His death was a loss to the church of God, his family and the world. Deeply do I feel it.

A discourse was delivered by the writer predicated upon Rom. viii. 20-25; 2 Thes. iv. 7, 8, setting forth the faith and hope of our brother, which was listened to with deep interest by the audience. The following hymns were sung:

Behold the western evening light
It melts in deep'ning gloom;
So calmly Christians sink away,
Descending to the tomb.

We may sleep, but not forever.

Elder Pardee, of the Disciple church, led the singing. The texts of Scripture and hymns were selected by the daughters of our brother. Brother L. was a warm friend of the late Joseph Marsh, an admirer of his writings and a supporter of THE RESTITUTION since Brother Chaplin has been its Editor.

R. V. LYON.

HUGHES.—In Arcata, H. B., California, Charles Edwin, son of Thomas and Mary Hughes, aged 7 years, 11 months and ten days.

It is with a heavy heart and trembling hand that I sit down to give you the particulars of one of our dear little one's sad death. He, in company with my father and brother's children were returning home from a short trip in the country. Our little Charlie was not feeling very well and a conveyance passing along at the time, he, child like, clambered on the hind part of the vehicle and got hold of the back of the hinderment seat. The horses started forward rather suddenly and the momentum caused him to fall backward, pulling the seat on top of him on the ground. It struck him across the abdomen bursting something inside, and he died the next day. Oh, how sad it is to lose one, especially more so by violence. He was a ruddy, sunny little one, so full of life and always pleasant. Life looked so sweet to him. Mowed down by the destroyer of the race, death, in the prime of youth; our little one's head lays beneath the cold ground resting peacefully until the trump sounds that will cause the bars to burst asunder and bring him forth from his sleep as if for a moment. In the twinkling of an eye we will meet never, never to part anymore.

Oh, friends all, the race is near run, please hold out faithful to death and a crown of everlasting life will be ours, a crown that we need not be ashamed of and one that no one can rob us of. What better reward do we want? Our part to do is small in comparison with the Lord's. His word has gone forth and he will not break it, it will not fail. Please, oh please hold out; it is not long, and I solemnly hope and it is my earnest desire that we all will be saved. I found kind friends among the Methodists and Presbyterians and others. Let us not be selfish with those of different denominations. There is one thing amongst that class, they seem to vie with one another to see who can do the most for afflicted ones. Let us not be selfish, let us pray for them too. It may be possible that some will be saved, at least I hope so. Remember charity is the greatest of all virtues. We must have love; if we do not have it we are lacking a great deal. There is no room for hatred or any of like kindred. The 1st commandment is love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and the 2nd is like to it, love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two hang all the law and the prophets. You see love is the hinge on which the structure swings. Our love to all.

THOS. HUGHES.

WHAT THOU WILT.

Do all Thou will? yes, only so
What warmth good to Thee-
Thou art so long, wise, and true,
It must be best for me.

Send what Thou will; or bosting shower,
Soft dew, or brilliant sun,
Alike in still or stormy hour,
My Lord, thy will be done.

Teach what thou will: reprove me here to
Each lesson full and sweet.
And deeper things of God discern
While sitting at thy feet.

Say what thou will; and let Thy word
My quick obedience win:
Let loyalty and love be stirred
To deeper glow within.

Give what thou will; for then I know
I shall be rich indeed:
My King rejoices to bestow
Supply for every need.

Take what thou will, beloved Lord-
For I have all in thee;
My sure exceeding great reward
Thou, thou thyself shalt be!

EXPERIMENTAL.

"If I hide myself up, how can the brethren approach me."

Editor Restitution:

You do not probably know that you or the brethren have such a sister of like precious faith. I want to tell you all that you have such an one and that she loves the Lord Jesus the Christ and is a firm believer in the gospel of the kingdom. For various reasons I have kept silent. In the first place I am illiterate. I was born of unwealthy parents; my mother was a feeble woman and as I was her main help had to be kept from school a great deal when young, and was married at a very tender age, consequently my advantages for literary acquirements have been limited. This is one of the many reasons why I have been so reluctant to speak to those dear loved ones whose articles appear in THE RESTITUTION from time to time. Another reason is that my husband is a writer who needs not to be ashamed to have his writing or his articles appear in public. I have for this reason felt embarrassed and thought I would not make him ashamed. And again we have been laboring under heavy financial embarrassments, our home being under mortgage [illegible] misfortune and by dreaming [illegible] it was impossible for us [illegible] means we be[illegible] debts, [illegible] were struggling hard [illegible] the stream to extricate ourselves. I did not feel that we could call aught our own and therefore did not feel at liberty nor did I see our way clear to send any money to THE RESTITUTION office for the support of those dear ones who, like ourselves, were struggling to be free.

I have thus toiled and labored until the cares of this life had well nigh swallowed me up. Besides there were some spiritual difficulties which I could not solve, some points of doctrine which have been discussed which so troubled me that I could not see clear. For instance what is the duty of Christians in these last days to pray for? I got so bewildered I did not know how to pray. Hence you will see your sister has been passing under the rod and that she is just emerging out from under a heavy cloud. The night has been dark and dreary, but thanks be to our heavenly Father who giveth us the victory through him that hath loved us, the clouds are being dispersed and there are some rays of the morning beginning to dawn in the east, the opposite from where my sun went down. Our financial burden has been in a measure taken away, our little home is clear of mortgage, and although the grasshoppers destroyed our crops last year, yet we hope, through the blessing of God, to be favored this year.

Having said so much by way of explanation and apology, after begging pardon from the dear household of faith whom I love for the truth's sake, and sincerely praying our heavenly Father's forgiveness, I want to tell you how I have found peace to my troubled heart. And while my efforts may be feeble, still it may be of some little use to those dear ones whose names I write. I cannot keep silent any longer, I want to express my gratitude to my loving sisters and brothers whose kind words of exhortation have been such a help to me by way of comforting and strengthening me through THE RESTITUTION and otherwise. In the first place dear Sister Dresser visited us last summer and stopped some two or three months. She found me in a sad and deplorable condition. I was overcome with hard work, and while I had not denied the faith, I had lost the spirit of prayer, or at least I did not know how to pray. Heaven seemed brass over my head. I felt that I was lost, irreparably lost. I had always believed that God would hear and answer the feeblest prayer of his children. But now it was discussed that we must live by faith, that there was no way that God would bless his believing children different from the world in these last days, only we must live and wait until the resurrection for our reward.

That was so annoying to my weak mind I got so bewildered I did not know how to pray, consequently had stopped praying to wait for more light from the word; and as I was not to expect any spirit to direct me only the written word, I became almost insane. When dear Sister Dresser came she brought some of the fruit of the spirit of Christ, and with that gentle love which caseth out fear she began to inspire me to pray. She had not forsaken her closet, she had trusted the word of God; she prayed for me, she warmed up my very nature spiritually, she soothed my aching brow, she fed me with some of this delicious fruit of the spirit, of which if any one eats it will be like a well of water springing up unto eternal life. Yes, thank our Heavenly Father she had such patience as should and always will grace the true Christian character. This, coupled with the crowning feature which is love, she applied to my poor, sin-sick soul, and not without the effect of faith.

Yes, dear brothers and sisters, that faith that sweetly works by love will purify the soul. God is the giver but we must be instruments in his hands, to be helps to each other. "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another." Mal. iii. 16. I wanted to tell you all how I prized your exhortations in the dear RESTITUTION. As soon as I could pray I read Brother Samuel Wilson's article on prayer, the prayer of faith. He said that he believed the testimony of James, "Is any afflicted let him pray; is any merry let him sing psalms; is any sick let him call for the elders." That this epistle meant just what it said, that it was just as binding on the people of God or the members of the one body as it was when it was spoken. Oh, how that article strengthened me for a long time. But I did not have strength enough to rise up and go to my closet till of late. Some way in reading Bro. Samuel's open letter in the number of Feb. 17, it struck me with such force, especially that part which says, "If we do not bear our cross and come after him, if we forsake not all for Christ, we cannot be his disciples. Deeds, not words, are what meet with the divine approval. And in that day when he comes to make up his jewels," said he, "I verily believe that some walking concordances and Biblical encyclopediæ will have to make room for the little ones, who in humility have served him, walking in his footsteps, feeding upon him as the bread of life, and growing up into his likeness." These words with the following beautiful verse attached,

Full many a gem of purest ray serene
The dark, unfathomed caves of ocean bear,
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness on the desert air.

He adds, "Let us, dear brethren, choose to sit at the feet of Jesus; there we will find peace and fullness of joy." Dear brother pray on in secret, continue to write open letters, for in due time the Master will bring you to Zion bearing many sheaves. Your words of comfort, your prayers of faith have truly saved the sick, and God, even thy God, shall reward thee openly. And then am not the only one. Dear Sister and Brother Wineo I want to be one of the number who return to give God the glory and to thank him that he still has those of his fold that are praying for me, even me. I read Sister Wineo's communication "Enter into thy closet," and oh, with what force does all her words written there in some home to me. Yes, my sister, I want to be looking for the dawn of redemption, and since reading your loving appeal I have entered my closet, and three times a day is not too much, like faithful Daniel, to hold sweet communion with the holy one who has promised when we cry unto him to answer.

I have kissed the lines of poetry penned by your precious hands, inserted in the same RESTITUTION with the heading, "I Am Praying for You." How little did you know when you penned those precious lines whose sorrowful heart through the help of God they would heal. I want to tell you away in California is one of the scattered sheep of his flock, and it is he heart, that, like your own, has been weighed down with troubles which she may not tell, but God has heard your prayer and has, as it were, touched my lips with a coal from the altar of prayer which you have erected in secret. May the Lord sustain you and bless you and your labors more abundantly, is the prayer of your unworthy sister [illegible] day [illegible] as she enters her closet to pray. Brother Wineo's communication of Feb. 11, "Knowledge and Charity," how it lifted me up; the whole communication was a feast to my hungry heart. Yes, my dear brethren, Christian graces and knowledge are but a dream if love be wanting there; and oh, how true, alas, too true, that so many who profess a firm belief in the written word of God have a form of godliness but deny the power thereof, and although they may bestow much labor to keep up an outside appearance, may say and do much to send the gospel to the lost in distant lands, lack that crowning grace, charity, which is love, and thereby chill their own family circle, those around them in their immediate circle of acquaintances. Instead of being constrained by the reflection of light which should emanate from them to glorify God, are led, as dear Brother Wineo says, to blaspheme his name from infidel principles, saying, we do not see in these persons what they profess.

And again, if any young converts have been led to see the first rays of the gospel of peace and love, and have chosen to join themselves to the people of God where they expected to find conganiality and warmth of spirit to grow in, if, I say, and it is a serious if, they find a cold indifference, they might well be tempted to turn back to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. My brethren, our dear Redeemer said to Peter, "Lovest thou me? feed my lambs." And if we love God we must keep his commandments, and it is affirmed they are not grevious.

I must draw this lengthy communication to a close lest I weary you, but I am so full of gratitude to my Heavenly Father and to my dear brothers and sisters. I want to mention all by name whose exhortations of love have borne me up, but time and space will not permit. I must speak of dear Brother Colegrove as his loving appeal in the late RESTITUTION so strongly invites the dear household to write comforting letters. I must tell all the family how I love those Miss Pen Notes, just because it does appear to me he puts into practice what he advises others to do, that is puts a little of his own soul into them. My brethren I am glad, oh, so glad that we can have a paper that is so adapted to our present need, that while we do what to teach the doctrine of faith in Christ, and much time should be spent in that way, we must not forget that while we preach the gospel to the outside world, we can scarcely devote too much time in exhortation to love and good works among those who have entered the fold. The lambs of the flock need attention and must be fed with the sincere milk of the word. With the loving attention that is due to the lambs of the fold none need be lost who have put on the precious name.

I have a young son, now nearly 21 years of age; he was immersed some 5 years ago, but being away from the society of the brethren he lives almost alone in the world. He has a large, warm heart, and clings pleadingly to me. He has a firm faith in the gospel and always defends the truth whenever attacked by unbelievers. He is one of the hungry hearts referred to by Bro. Colegrove, and always is comforted by his articles. Dear Sister Coffman's talks to the younger folks, how I do appreciate all her good instructions. She is just such a teacher as they need. I do think to train up our children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord is just what we should do, and if there were more mothers and grandmothers like Timothy's of old, there would be more tender shoots springing up from the top root, and the tender branches would add new vigor to the older branches. May the Lord bless Sister Coffman in her labor of love, and may he who said "Suffer the little ones to come unto me and forbid them not," draw many into her fold that she may come to Zion bearing many sheaves.

And last though not least would I try to speak some words of comfort and sympathy to those dear, sorrow-stricken hearts whom, as we so often learn from THE RESTITUTION, have been called to the house of mourning, some having lost companions, some brothers, sisters, and some the tender offspring whom their hot tears cannot call back from the land of the enemy. One and all who have been called thus to mourn, your sister mourns with you. But we do not mourn as do those who have no hope. Thank God for the unspeakable gift of his Son who is the resurrection and the life, and for the beautiful illustration of his sympathy at the grave of Lazarus, when his sisters came to him bathed in tears; how he wept for the love he bore those dear sisters who believed in him. Lift up your heavy hearts dear sorrowing ones, for 'tis this same Jesus that still holds the keys of the resurrection and life forevermore, amen.

If I hold my peace the very stones would cry out, hence the head of this article. If I hide myself up how can the loved ones approach me, or come near unto me. After such strong invitations from those of the same household to write letters to each other, and having so strong an inclination to do so, I have ventured to write this strange and perhaps untimely communication, timidly yet lovingly I confess. Now dear Brother Chaplin if you have other communications which you feel will do more good, or if you have no room for all the correspondence, I shall not feel grieved should you pass this by. But please give my Christian love to all the loved ones in your congregation. Please look lightly over all bad spelling and other mistakes and correct them as they deserve. May God spare your life and health that you may be able to perform your labor of love as our Editor for years to come is my daily prayer. I hope to get some subscribers at least for three months for THE RESTITUTION soon. At least I am going to try. Your sister in the blessed hope,

MRS. ANGELINE WILSON.

Editor Restitution:

I left home on the sixth day of March and arrived at Greenup, Ill., the same evening. Met Brother Rawlings at the depot to escort me to his home, where we rested a short time and then went to the school house where we spoke to a very intelligent crowd of people at night and also on Sunday at eleven o'clock. From Greenup I went to Corinth church (a meeting house owned by the Christian denomination and located about four miles northwest of Jewett, Cumberland Co., Ill.,) and held a discussion with one James M. Hill of that order, on the following propositions, first, "Do the Scriptures teach that the kingdom of God or of Christ is now set up," he affirming. Second, "Do the Scriptures teach that man is unconscious between death and the resurrection," I affirming. I could say more about the discussion but I don't think it prudent to do so now. I am going back there according to promise to hold a series of meetings about the last of May, if nothing hinders.

After the discussion was over I went to a school house about three-fourths of a mile from the above church and held meeting Saturday night, Sunday and Sunday night with good attendance and good attention. (They had meeting at the same time at the church.) At the last named place I got two subscribers for THE RESTITUTION. I think it next to my Bible for instruction. There are many things of great value for the Bible student to learn through the columns of THE RESTITUTION. I know for myself that I have learned many grand and noble lessons by perusing its columns. Then brethren and sisters in the Lord let us rally around THE RESTITUTION by giving our assistance to aid in publishing it and sending it to the world. Would to God we could place it in every family in the land. Let us each realize the fact that it is our day to work for the truth, for the Savior said, the night cometh when no man can work. John xix. 4.

From the above place I went to Mt. Morlah, a union house in Clark Co., Ill., where I delivered six discourses to a well filled house, and at the close of the meeting we went to the river and baptized six souls in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ to rise to walk in newness of life. May they ever continue faithful unsil their work is finished. At the last mentioned place we organized a little band of believers and the number was twelve. Oh, how I was impressed with the thought, Jesus said, "fear not little flock for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Luke xi. 32.

From here I went to Brother Sweet's and spoke Friday night, Saturday night and Sunday at eleven o'clock, which closed our meeting for this place, the Christians claiming the house Sunday night for social meeting. Of course they are good people for they wanted to hold the house for no other purpose than to keep me from preaching there. May the good Lord reward them for it. At the last mentioned place on Sunday afternoon we went to the water and baptized one more, a noble young man, in the all-saving name of the Lord Jesus Christ. May he prove to be a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth. Thus ended our meetings in Illinois, and I returned home to my family to rest awhile. Any one wishing to correspond with me can do so by addressing me at Sugar Creek, Hancock Co., Ind. Your brother in hope of the soon coming kingdom,

Or, A Scriptural View of the Second Coming of Christ, with the Wonderful Signs that will Precede it, and the still more Wonderful Things that will Follow it.

—BY SILAS HENN.—

NOTICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS:

The book is truthful, reverent and instructive, every way worthy of the attention of those who prefer calm argument to sensational speculation.—The Rainbow.

We are desirous to express our sympathy with the general scope of the book, and to bespeak for it a wide and cordial reception.—The Messenger.

The volume before us is evidently the product of a thoughtful mind, and deserves the careful study of every Christian, being of a very comprehensive character, and based on Scripture. Certainly it is the best work on the subject which has come under our notice.—The Sydney Observer.

The treatment shows that the author has studied well and patiently digested his theme before writing upon it, and we feel as we read page after page, stimulated rather than clogged in our inquiry..... The aim of the volume before us is to set the truth clearly before the mind, and so restore to its place in the consciousness of the church the hope that was once so dear to God's suffering saints, and is still so to many, but which is always unwelcome to a wealthy, cold and formal church, and hated by the world. This little volume will be received and read with pleasure by all who take interest in prophetic subjects.—Rev. Nathaniel West, D. D.

THE COMING AGE.

—OR—

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. WESTHOE.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Anyone, the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of the coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many "other signs, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than fifty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents facts of views calculated to shine with brilliance and with reason. It also shows the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of bygone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forcing its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is mocking and frustrating the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensation yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, states-craft, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great thinking Hand in working out the purposes of Divine wisdom and the fiat of the Crown (sceptre Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the supreme Majesty and the [illegible] power of the Divine Sovereign who rules and governs all.

It contains over 300 [illegible] pages, bound in Cloth. Price $2.00. Send to this office for this work.

THE SIN AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT. Part 2.

MATT. xii. 22-37; Mark iii. 20-30; Heb. vi. 4-6; x. 26-31.

The final conclusions to which our inquiry on this subject tends have already been foreshadowed with sufficient clearness to make little else needful than to substantiate them by a brief examination of the two passages referred to in the Hebrews. The sin against the Spirit is a sin of the tongue, like the corresponding sin against the Son of Man. It is speaking against the Spirit. It is wilful defamation of the Spirit. It comes from those who know better, and whose very object is to degrade the Spirit. It is wicked in the extreme. It is committed in defiance of the clearest light and the sweetest grace displayed on the part of the Spirit maligned. As we have already insisted, this blasphemy against the Holy Spirit could not be committed until the days of the Spirit's manifestation. As the Son of Man must first challenge men's opinions of him before he could be blasphemed of them, so must it be with the Spirit: men must be moved to say something about the Spirit before they could be provoked to say something malicious. And this consideration points to the time inaugurated by the Day of Pentecost; for only then, and thenceforward, were the Spirit's presence and working so manifest as to furnish the needful provocative.

It is no objection to this conclusion that the warning went forth beforehand, ere yet the days of the Spirit's full manifestation had arrived: "It was [illegible] of our Lord—just like him—to [illegible] anxious anxiety anticipation, before the consummating display of Divine Love had made the blackest sin possible. That display was then imminent when Jesus spoke; and the very men who actually committing the penultimate transgression might live to perpetrate the final crime. Moreover, while the warning was most merciful, it was at the same time well fitted to indure our Lord's wildest enemies to pause. Were they, then, in defaming the Nazarene most deeply offending God? Were they on the high road to work out the ruin of their own souls, by bracing themselves up to withstand God himself—to withstand him, too, by perverting and flinging from them, and speaking with contempt of those supreme displays of spiritual force and renewing favor which were according to their own prophets, to characterize the dispensation of the Messiah? Well might these malignant talkers shrink, before it is too late, from their own utter undoing. So that we find no objection at all involved in saying that Jesus warned against the blasphemy of the Spirit some little time before that sin could be committed.

Neither is any objection to be found in the admitted fact that the Holy Spirit was already present and operative in the Son of Man. That is true; but not in such wise as to lead men, at that time, to talk about the Spirit itself. They talk about Jesus, not about the Holy Spirit. They wickedly denied that Jesus wrought his works by the Holy Spirit. They did not set the Holy Spirit before their minds, and then spoke against him. Therefore they did not then and there blaspheme the Spirit, the temptation to do that [illegible] come. All of which agrees with the well-known declaration made [illegible] while ministering in lowliness on earth, that the Spirit was not [illegible] he himself was not yet [illegible].

We now glance at those two great passages in the Epistle to the Hebrews, which so wonderfully fit into the niche which the Gospels leave for them; for truly wonderful the harmony seems to be. We give the passages from the Revised Version.

"For as touching those who were once enlightened and tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and tasted of the good Word of God, and the powers of the age to come, and then fell away; it is impossible to renew them again unto repentance, seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame."

"For if we sin wilfully, after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful expectation of judgment, and fiercness of fire which shall devour the adversaries."

In every conceivable way is there here made evident an advance upon the state of things seen in those passages in the Gospels in which Jesus is said to have blasphemed. There it was only the Son of Man that was defamed; here it is the Son of God that is crucified afresh (in the one passage), and trodden underfoot (in the other). There it was not at all a question of falling away, since there is no evidence that the defaming Pharisees and Scribes had ever even outwardly attached themselves to Jesus; here it is. There it was only a question (unconsciously involved) of ultimately crucifying Jesus; here it is a question of intentionally doing what was equivalent to crucifying him afresh. There, no especial experience of the truth is attributed to the Pharisees and Scribes who defamed Jesus: they knew the truth, yet they knew it not. The proofs were before them, and must have begotten in their minds some measure of conviction. At any rate, they were responsible for the use they made of these proofs; and if they did not know, they might have known that Jesus was the Christ of God. But still, although this much is true, yet we cannot go much further without exaggeration. Men may feel the remonstrances of conscience, and never deliberately yield to them. Indipient conviction may be smothered in the birth, especially when hostile passions are at work. So that, in the absence of any opposing evidence, we may safely deny that the defamers of our Lord, in the Gospels, had anything that can properly be described as an inward experience of the truth. But here, in the Hebrews, all that is changed. It is not merely that the crowning proofs in the way of outward demonstration, by his resurrection, etc., have now been given that Jesus is the Son of God; but those proofs have received inward verification on the part of those described by an experience of what the Risen Christ can do in the individual hearts and lives of men. The persons described in the former passage as "falling away" have been, not only once upon a time (ποτε), but once for all (απαξ) enlightened; and therefore effectually, with a completeness which might have held good for all purposes and for evermore. In addition to this (according to the text of the R. V.), or as the case of it (according to the margin), the enlightened ones have both tasted of the heavenly free gift (whether of remission of sins or of eternal life does not matter to our argument), and have been made partakers of the Holy Ghost—this last-named predicate being particularly strong: "constituted partners" (with Christ and his brethren), by sharing "in the Holy Spirit" as a gift bestowed. Furthermore, they have "tasted God's word," or Gospel proclamation, "to be good" or "sweet" (καλον); that is, they have made proof of it and found it to be what it really is when appropriated. And, finally they have tasted the blessedness of possessing the powers, and—judging from the word (δυναμεις) in the plural—probably doing the supernatural works of a coming age. It is hard to see how a real personal knowledge of Christ's risen power could be more clearly indicated than by this series of experiences. These men not merely might have known that Jesus was the Son of God; they did know it, with a verified knowledge borne in upon them and wrought into their consciousness in every conceivable way; herein exactly agreeing with the description of Christian character contained in the second passage; where it is not merely the gnosis, or "knowledge," but the epignosis, or "knowledge upon proof"—the experimental knowledge—which has been received: "received," mark, as a divine gift given. After which it is only in keeping to find these men spoken of as having actually been sanctified by the (sprinkled or applied) blood of (the new) covenant.

Here, then, we have a basis furnished for the commission of a louder and more violent sin than the defamers in the gospels were in a position to commit. Where much is given, much is required. Everything has here been given; nothing withheld. The Son of God has committed himself to these later Hebrews as he never did to those earlier ones. These, therefore, have it in their power to wound him and injure themselves as those never had. These can say, as those could not: "We have tried it, and proved it an imposition. We have waited for the so called gifts, and found them nought. We renounce the whole business. If Jesus were here, we crucify him over again. The so-called Spirit of Truth is a Spirit of lies. He makes enthusiasts and deceivers. That is our verdict, after trial made."

Nor is anything wanting in the description given of it to make this later sin answer exactly to the premonitory description given of it by our Lord. He called it "speaking against," "defaming," "blaspheming" the Holy Spirit. If that precious designation is not used in Heb. vi. and x., there is more than covers it. The Holy Spirit is expressly named in both passages; and considering that men could not so fall away as described without saying so—seeing that, short of distinct avowal, it could never be known by the adversary but that there might be some lingering reverence for the Spirit left—it would seem to be altogether unreasonable to doubt the presence of formal blasphemy here. Indeed, as if to make this certain, the apostates are described in the second of the two passages in the Hebrews as "insulting" and "willfying" the Holy Spirit, who, with a master-stroke, is termed "the Spirit of favor." The entire revolt put forth is open and avowed. The Spirit, as the attester and glorifier of the Son of God, is unquestionably and literally blasphemed.

One point only, on the merits, remains to be noticed: it is of supreme importance in respect of the general bearings of our subject. It is this: Our Lord forewarned his hearers that the sin against the Holy Spirit could never be forgiven; but he did not say why. We feel sure the intimation could be in no sense arbitrary—that there must be some intrinsic reason for it. We think we find the reason quite clearly indicated in these two extracts from the Epistle to the Hebrews. The former passage tells us that it is impossible to renew such apostates to repentance. Profound and far-reaching declaration! There is always something interesting in the process, when a man changes his mind. How hard it is for some people to say, "I am wrong." What a mercy it is that poor, erring creatures can ever have the grace to say, "Ah, I see my mistake; I am on a wrong track;" How often pride and obstinacy prevent withdrawal from a position once taken; and in how many ways, in how many instances, does persistence in the once made-up mind prove fatal. No mere persuasion can induce some men to change their minds; you must let in new light upon the subject, and must so skilfully appeal from Philip uninformed to Philip informed as to save your friend's self-respect, or you have not the slightest chance of turning him. "No mere persuasion," we just now said; and yet persuasion, or at least personal influence, often goes a long way to make our friends willing to see they are wrong; it is another thing, then, to help them out of their error. Well: "repentance" is a change of mind, a revolution in the direction of our thoughts, a recalling of one conclusion and a substitution of another for it. What a merciful thing the possibility of repentance towards God is. The writer to the Hebrews so appreciates this that he actually regards repentance as springing out of renewal. Men are renewed to repentance. Somehow love makes them willing to change their minds, and light shows them how to do it. All of which it becomes us humbly to admit, whether we can piece it into our theological systems or not. This renewal, which goes before and induces repentance, may not be full and proper "regeneration," in the current theological sense of the term, but renewal in some sort, to some degree, it is; and the thing to note well, just here, is that, however many times I may have been renewed unto repentance, there is a line I must not cross at any mortal peril. Once beyond that, and I can be renewed unto repentance no more. That line is drawn by the act of retiling "the Spirit of favor" when once I have come to experimental proof of his gracious power. And mark the absoluteness of the sacred writer's denial of the possibility of such renewal. He says it cannot be done. He makes no reference to time. He does not say it will be long, or will be an age, before repentance can come. Nor is he content with proclaiming renewal to be difficult: he declares it to be impossible. He does not say, we can do no more; all we can do is to leave the apostate to the resources of a merciful God. No; simply declaring that the thing cannot be done, the natural—the only effective—interpretation is that it cannot be done by God or man. The impossibility springs from the irrevocable constitution of the human mind, which, however it may be helped or hindered, can never be absolutely overborne.

We see, then, why this one sin cannot be forgiven; it is because it cannot be repented of. It so closes up every avenue that the grace to repent cannot enter.

Having grasped one reason for the unpardonableness of the unpardonable sin, we can now pass on to lay hold of another, quite clearly indicated in the second passage from the Epistle to the Hebrews. It cannot be forgiven—because no sacrifice for it remains. Mark the conclusive and well-supported words of the Revised Version: "There remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins." "Remaineth no more," that is, "remaineth not longer." So runs the well-meant gloss we once heard from the pulpit. "But that remaineth" is forbidden not only by the context (wherein the sacred writer's "but" is a very different one from that just named, one which, instead of bringing the sinner back to the One Sacrifice, conducts him to devouring judgment), but also by the force of ουκετι, which is here manifestly a word of time (there once was a sacrifice for the man; there is now one no longer). It was no doubt hard to think that This Sacrifice did not remain, so long as repentance was assumed to be possible. But no such difficulty stands in our way when the possibility of repentance is seen to have taken flight. The One Sacrifice was never intended to wash away persistent sin; and sin that cannot be repented of is indeed persistent, irrevocable, eternal: the which exactly brings us round to our Lord's own word as preserved by Mark: he that blasphemes the Spirit is "guilty of an eternal sin;" a sin (we are stunned, as if it were an error continued on), but a sin—an act, a deed, a thing done, a result — recovery (of) which nothing can turn aside, the impending doom. There is no help for it; such sinners, judgment must devour.

So, then, there are two all-sufficient reasons why blaspheming the Spirit should be unpardonable: it cannot be repented of, and it has no sacrifice. Many most important conclusions arise from our subject.

All other sins "shall be forgiven;" absolutely "shall," says our Lord. Therefore all other sins will be repented of, sooner or later.

Unless the extreme position be taken that no man ever did or ever will blaspheme the Spirit, it further follows that some will be inevitably and finally lost. Therefore Universalism is not true.

Thousands have entertained the bitter belief that they had committed the unpardonable sin, into whose hearts such an atrocity as reviling the Spirit of grace never entered, and whose lips could never be brought to breathe a syllable in the nature of such defamation. They may have sinned against and deeply grieved the Spirit, as they themselves have reverently bewailed. But they have repented of their backslidings with all thoroughness of mind and life; only they have remained bereft of light and joy and power, by the mistake that they were beyond the reach of mercy. Well may we fly to the relief of such sorrowing souls, who, whatever their failures, are writing bitterer things of themselves than God himself has written.

And now, finally, as soon as we become outsiders, if we absolutely shut out from our view the moral certainty that for the sons of men at large there of necessity remain the opportunities, the manifestations of the Son of God, the enlightenment, the working of the Spirit of grace, by which all sin shall be shut up, either to declare itself inveterate, and so be put beyond the pale of pardon, or be made to yield to the solvent of Love Divine and be forgiven—according to the confident prediction of our magnanimous and glorious Lord?—Ed. Rainbow.

Great Thoughts.

The working of the good and brave seen or unseen, endures literally forever, and cannot die.—Carlyle.

The good we can each accomplish in this world is small. The good that all men in all ages could accomplish if they would is vast. But in order that this may be done each working being must serve his own generation and do his part to render the next generation more efficient.—T. D. Woolsey.

When you make a mistake don't look back at it long. Take the lesson of the thing into your mind, and then look forward. Mistakes are lessons of wisdom. The past can not be changed. The future is yet in your power.—Hugh White.

Get into the habit of looking for the silver lining of the cloud, and when you have found it, continue to look at it, rather than the leaden grey in the middle.—A. A. Willets.

A kind word if you say, if only that it may come in, perhaps, with [illegible] opportuneness, entering some [illegible] sorrowful man's darkened room like a beautiful firefly, whose happy convolutions he can not call watch, forgetting his many troubles.—Arthur Helps.

Doing nothing for others is the undoing of one's self. We must be purposely kind and generous, or we miss the best part of existence. The heart that goes out of itself gets large and full of joy. This is the great secret of the inner life. We do ourselves the most good doing something for others.—Horace Mann.

If you have built castles in the air, your work need not be lost; that is where they should be; now put foundations under them.—Thoreau.

It seems to me we can never give up longing and wishing while we are thoroughly alive. There are certain things we feel to be beautiful and good, and we must hunger after them.—George Eliot.

Served Him Right.

On a Fort Wayne train approaching Chicago, there was a short-statured, straight-haired, copper-colored Indian, going back to the reservation after a trip to the Indian school at Carlyle, Pa. He wore a nice suit of clothes, which fitted him badly, and a paper collar without any necktie. He attended strictly to his own business, and was unmolested until a young fellow came into the smoking-car from the sleeper. "An Indian, I guess," said the young man, as he lighted a cigarette. And then approaching the son of the plains, he attracted general attention by shouting, with strange gestures, "Ugh, heap big Injun! Omaha Blouse! Pawnee! See Great Father! Have drink fire-water? Warm Injun's blood!" The copper-colored savage gazed at the young man a moment with an ill-concealed expression on his face, and then he said with a good pronunciation: "You must have been reading dime novels, sir, I am going back to my people in Montana, after spending three years in the East at school. I advise you to do the same thing. No, I do not drink whisky. Where I live gentlemen do not carry whisky flasks in their pockets." The cigarette was not smoked out, and amid a general laugh, a much crestfallen young man retired to the sleeping coach.—Youth's Companion.

The Book of Jobab, called Job, Son of Zare, Son of Hraguel, Son of Hesau, Son of Isaac, Son of Habraam, — According to the Septuagint.

CHAP. XI.

1. And Sophar, the Minite, taking up the discourse, saith:

2. The one who hath much to say will not also listen; and the easy talker forsooth, thinketh he is just.

3. Blessed is he that is begotten of woman in being short-lived. Abound not in words, for there is no one to oppose thee in judgment.

4. Say not indeed I am clean in my works and blameless in his sight.

5. Moreover how shall the Lord talk with thee and open his lips to thee?

6. Then might he tell thee of wisdom's ability, how that it shall be double that of those opposed to thee. And then wouldst thou know that things worthy of thee come from the Lord, against which things thou hast sinned.

7. Wilt thou find the track of the Lord, or reach the remotest things which the Almighty hath made?

8. The heavens are high and what wilt thou do? and what knowest thou of things deeper than those in hades?

9. Or of things longer than the measure of the earth or the breadth of the sea?

10. If he should subvert them all who would say to him, what hast thou done?

11. Yea he knoweth the works of transgressors and the one who seeth places that are not places, will not fail to see them.

3. My heart indeed is against you.

4. Hath a just man and a blameless been begotten for mockery?

5. Yea hath he been made ready to fall at the hands of others in an appointed time?

6. And his houses to be torn down in ruin by transgressors? No indeed, but on the other hand let no one who is wicked trust that he will be held guiltless; any who provoke the wrath of the Lord, that there will not be a searching examination of them.

7. Yea forsooth ask the four-footed if they can speak to thee and the flying things of the heavens, if they can tell thee;

Some articles communicated by Bro. J. Cameron on the Gospel of the Kingdom have just arrived which we shall place before our readers in our next issues. Some from other correspondents will be given as soon as possible. Brethren will be patient, as manuscripts have accumulated on our hands, and we have been burdened with a great many cares of late. CORRECTIONS.—In Sister Williams' article—Notes No. 6—please make the following corrections of mistakes. In the second column and third paragraph from the top in the clause, "unless he wills never to receive them" read revive; and in the next sentence read for "hold out" blot out. We have not been able to find the little misland slip containing some corrections noted by Brother Silas Heap in one of his articles. From the Manatee River Advocate, published at Braidentown, Florida, of date April 1, we clip the following notice:—

"Mr. Dwiggins preached in the Union Chapel on last Sunday, March 27, in the morning to a good audience. His subject, 'The Signs of the Times,' was most ably handled by the eloquent gentleman, and showed conclusively that he was perfectly at home (as the saying is) on this subject. While the writer would differ very materially with Mr. Dwiggins as to many of his conclusions, he, the writer, was most agreeably interested in the discourse. Next Sunday Mr. Dwiggins will preach on the same subject, let everybody hear him."

CONVERSIONS UNDER PHILIPS PREACHING.

Although Saul "made havoc of the church" through persecution, he utterly failed to stop the spread of the gospel. What he did only widened the field of Christian labor. Acts viii. Scattering the church at Jerusalem converted its members into missionaries to bear the truth into the "regions beyond." They went everywhere preaching the word. 4th v. Philip found an open door in Samaria and "he preached Christ unto them." This general proposition covers the whole ground of gospel truth, but affords us no clue to particular truths incidentally in it. The 12th verse unfolds the meaning to be, "The things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ." Here are logically two statements: the things concerning the kingdom, and the things concerning the name of Christ, or, the things concerning the Christ, being the idea intended. The word things is plural, but how many things Philip preached concerning Christ and the kingdom we cannot learn from this book nor from any other in the Christian Scriptures, so we can never know what amount of knowledge is absolutely necessary as a prerequisite to baptism.

Philip, like Paul, undoubtedly quoted largely from the Law and the Prophets in all his discourses. Acts xxviii. 23. The kingdom then in the light of all the promises and prophecies will be at some future time on the earth, but he of heavenly origin and constitution. It will be where God placed the first Adam and invested him with dominion over the earth and every living thing on the earth. Gen. i. 28. Where the moral and physical evil introduced by the fall) is found, for where the ruin was wrought, Christ the promised seed of the woman, will achieve the victory that places this revolted planet under the dominion of righteousness and truth, as represented under the figure of bruising the serpent's head. It will be where the promise to Abraham and his seed, the Christ, places it, in the land of Canaan as an everlasting possession, Gen. xiii. 15; xvii. 8.

Some make a [illegible] not, however, in the [illegible] preach these things, but [illegible] preach almost [illegible] Jesus accomplished when here on earth, and what was the character he exhibited among men. They preach far too little touching the living, personal Christ in his relation to Christianity. Rather than faith and practice; as he is the very soul of the religion he taught and illustrated. This fault grows out of the spirit of controversy engendered by the opposition of the religious world to the doctrine of Christ's future reign on the earth.

The kingdom preached by Philip is to be of heavenly origin and constitution, the one to which Christ is entitled by heirship in the Davidic line, and by loyalty to the will of his Father. The earth will be the place of its locality, as can be proven beyond the possibility of a doubt by the promise to David that his house and kingdom and throne shall be established forever before David, or in his presence. 2 Sam. vii. 16. By the promise to Abraham and his seed, the Christ, of the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, Gen. xiii. 14. By the promise that this same seed, the Christ, shall possess the gate of his enemies (Gen. xxii. 17) and bless all nations. 18th verse. Proven by the fact that God has promised to give to his Son the heathen (nations) for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession. Psa. ii. 8. And to set this truth in the clearest light, Daniel says this kingdom which the God of heaven is to set up in the days of the division of the Roman or fourth kingdom (chap. ii. 44) shall break in pieces, and consume all these kingdoms.

As a bar to all unlawful inferences this same Daniel says, The kingdom and the dominion and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High. vii. 27. It is under the heaven, not above. The prayer which Christ taught his disciples to pray embodies the same truth. Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as in heaven. Matt. vi. 10. In the closing visions of God's Revelation to man John sees this universal prayer, the prayer of all churches, and the quite unconscious prayer of groaning creation answered when he hears great voices in heaven saying, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever." Rev. xi. 15. The opening page of the divine book places man in an earthly paradise of heavenly beauty, with the promise of dominion over the earth and animate nature. Its closing visions present to us a picture of this same earth so charming, so enrapturing, so beautiful and glorious that the pilgrim saints long for the vision to become the glad and joyful reality.

It is the strangest thing imaginable to me that the greater part of the Christian world should overlook the kingdom of promise of prophecy of the gospel, and seize upon and hold in tenacious opinion one undergirded by no promise, a kingdom to which no inspired utterance gives the shadow of claim. To hold a theory as a matter of faith in the absence of any proof may be regarded as unreasonable, but to hold a theory as a matter of faith against proof of the plainest kind!—what shall we call this? The power of creed and prejudice is very strong.

How many things or how much Philip preached concerning the kingdom as prerequisite to baptism we cannot learn from this book nor from any other book in the Bible. Therefore to insist on a definite amount of knowledge prior to baptism is plainly unscriptural. In this brief history of preaching and conversions no mention is made of repentance, but we should not conclude on the ground of this omission that it was not commanded and made obligatory in the case of these Samaritan converts as a prerequisite to their baptism, as well as in the case of the converts of Jerusalem whom Peter commanded to repent. The case of Simon the sorcerer who was commanded by Peter to repent of a special wickedness or sin committed after his baptism, implies that the many sins of him and the other converts had been repented of in obedience to commandment given in the course of Philip's preaching but not recorded in this very short history.

There are then plainly three steps necessary in order to become a Christian: faith, repentance and baptism. In this record of Luke's, faith is stated in the word "believed," repentance implied and baptism mentioned as being attended to. This agrees exactly with the record of the second chapter where the faith of the three thousand is implied in the statement that they "were pricked in their hearts" and in the earnest question of "what shall we do?" Baptism and repentance being positively commanded. These are the terms of pardon of a sinner or alien; and yet his salvation must be ascribed to the abounding love, grace and mercy of the Lord. Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Spirit, Titus iii. 5; and justified by grace." v. 7. Thus all boasting is excluded and the sinner, though now accounted righteous in Christ must bear in memory to the end of life the humbling conviction that he is saved from the penalty of violated law through the mercy of the Great Judge.

NOTES ON ANASTASIS.—NO. 7.

The second proposition is left as wanting in proof as the first. He has given no proof that the saints of God will be called forth from the dust of sheol to linger in a state of expectancy, and dread uncertainty as to whether they will be accepted or not, until each one in turn has been arraigned before the tribunal of Christ and told the story of their lives. I have before shown that it is recorded of some of God's faithful servants that they knew even while yet in this life, what their portion would be in the future; and we know it is revealed that God is no respecter of persons; and therefore if one saint of God can rest in full assurance of faith of a glorious resurrection to life and immortality, it is the privilege of all!

Please turn to the following texts and read them with their contexts; and then, judge ye if in these we are taught that the saints of the Most High, will there appear in their mortal "reorganized disintegrated remains," and individually tell all the history of their lives; that according to their own account, they may be judged worthy of eternal life, or death. Rom. xiv. 10, 12; (1–14); Matt. xii. 36; (32–37); 1 Peter iv. 6, (1–7). Acts x. 42, and xvii. 31. Rom. ii. 6. 2 Cor. v. 10. For we must all be made manifest before the judgment seat of Christ, that each one may receive the things done in the body according to what he hath done; whether it be good or bad. Whatever record we have made of life in their mortal flesh will then be made manifest. This language applies only to the body of Christ whom the apostle calls "we." If we appear there, having laid the foundation of our faith in the Christ, and then instead of building on this foundation, revealed truths, we have built thereon wood, hay and stubble, human speculative theories, which have no foundation in the Word, we shall suffer loss, and though saved, it will be "so as by fire" 1 Cor. iii. 11, 16. Our reward will be lost. But if on the other hand, we built on the sure foundation, gold, silver, and precious stones, (the truth as revealed), we shall reap the reward, according to the deeds done in the body. We are not told that we shall reap in the resurrected body according to the deeds done while in our mortal body, but according to the deeds done while in the flesh, the mortal body, we shall be rewarded, i. e. the reward will not be given through the mortal resurrected body.

The third proposition, namely, "The Scriptures teach positively and without reserve, that the righteous are raised incorruptible." This statement, founded in the sure word of the Lord has already been proved in these notes, yet other points bearing on this subject will be taken up in due time as we proceed in this investigation.

That it may be better understood what were the sentiments and teachings of the author of Anastasis as set forth in that work—which today occupies a very prominent place in all lists of "books for sale" setting forth the religious teachings of Christadelphians, I ask the forbearance of our readers in giving some extracts which tend neither to edification nor the clearer exposition of Bible truth. He says in referring to the proposition just named. "These (the above propositions) have been affirmed, and argued, for the purpose of setting aside the doctrine set forth in the first and second volume of my exposition of the Apocalypse called Eureka; and which is termed by them, false teaching—an opinion, unscriptural, heretical, and contrary to the gospel Paul preached. They consider that in the second volume of Eureka, this alleged false teaching, is in form more offensive than in the first; and that in the exposition given by me in said work, I have denied the faith, and endeavored to preach another gospel, and so have brought myself under the curse pronounced by Paul upon such. Thus they charge me with "apostasy" while

I WOULD LIVE ALWAYS.

O, I would live always
In the evergreen house:
Where the pure and the holy
In pleasure will room.

Where no evil can enter
Their joys to molest:—
In the land of the loyal
And the home of the blest.

Where the saints of the ages
In triumph will meet,
With shouts of hosanna
Their Savior to greet.

While the age of all ages
Unceasing rolls on,
And loud Hallelujahs
The anthem prolong.

Then our toils will be ended,
And the weary will rest
In the evergreen home
Of the pure and the blest.

While peace like a river
Flows o'er the bright plains;
And the moonlife of glory,
Eternally reigns.

Then songs to the Savior
As onward we roam
Through the sweet bow'rs of Eden
Our bright happy home.

Life's conflicts are ended,
Its perils all o'er:
We have entered the haven
Of the Evergreen Shore

there is no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus; we were enemies, we are reconciled by his blood: there was a fearful looking for of judgment, but our hearts have been sprinkled from an evil conscience; we were strangers, but we have been brought nigh by the blood of Christ, and have boldness of access and confidence, by his blood; we were sold under sin, but we have been bought by the precious blood of Christ; we are still liable to defeat, but blessed be God, we can overcome by the blood of the Lamb. Let us try to be faithful to our trust, and live the truth always, ever looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior, Jesus Christ; and when he appears, we shall be made like him, for we shall see him as he is. Oh, transporting thought, see him in his: actually see him who died for us; actually hear his dear voice, saying, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you, from the foundation of the world." This will more than make amends for any sacrifices—make us forget all the ills of mortality. There will be no graves there: no sick beds, no bleeding hearts, no more partings, no broken spirits, no fightings without, no fears within. All will be serenity, and joy, and peace. And beloved, the scene is not one we merely catch a glimpse of—we shall not merely hear the last strain of the music of that sphere. No, blessed be God, it will be everlasting morning; it will be perennial spring; there will be an unwasting sun, there will be immortal youth, for God shall wipe all tears from off all faces, and there shall be no more death. Glorious thought. May God in his infinite mercy, grant us a home with all the redeemed hosts, for his name's sake.

THE KINGDOM. No 2.

It would seem from Ezk. xlv. 8, that in the earthly Jerusalem one will be set up as the prince who will be the highest of all the earthly rulers. He will be chosen and qualified and authorized by the King; and he shall enter in and out of the sanctuary by one gate, and none else shall be permitted to do so. "It is for the prince; the prince, he shall sit in it to eat bread before the Lord; he shall enter by the way of the porch of that gate, and shall go out by the way of the same."

Psa. lxxii. 8–11, teaches that Christ will have world-wide dominion. The extent of his kingdom will be the extent of the world. "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth. They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him; and his enemies shall lick the dust. The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents: (margin; or, render tribute). The kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts. Yea, all kings shall fall down before him: all nations shall serve him."

Referring to Luke i. 31–33: "And behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shall call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Most High: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Dr. Pitcairn says, The first part of this marvellous announcement met with a literal fulfilment, as we all know, in the incarnation of the Son of God, the most mysterious of all the events which the annals of the earth can produce: the latter part remains unfulfilled to this day. But can we doubt that so surely as that wondrous child was born, so surely he shall yet occupy the throne promised to him, which is an earthly throne, and there he shall reign? No language can be more explicit than that of Gabriel to Mary. Jesus, now in heaven, shall return to earth; which is to be the theatre of his kingly glory. However unlikely it may appear to us that the throne of David, which has lain prostrate and empty for so many long centuries, shall again be erected and occupied; yet it must be. The Lord God is to give it to his Incarnate Son. No power on earth can hinder it. On that throne Jesus is to reign; and then "Men on earth shall be blest in him: and all nations shall call him blessed." Psalm lxxii. 17. His reign is to be continued throughout all the ages: and this is the strongest pledge to us, that the continuance of the earth itself must be commensurate with his reign."

In Dan. vii. 14, it is said that the kingdom is given to the Son of man. In verse 18, it is said that "the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom." But there is no contradiction here, for the expressions are easily reconciled. Christ and his people are one, blessedly one. They are united to him by faith, as the branch is united to the vine. He has suffered for them, and they have borne suffering for his sake. And the glory which is given to him by the Father, he gives them, or shares it with them. Both Christ and his saints, therefore, are one in their possession of the kingdom. "Behold a King shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment." Isa. xxxii. 1. The princes will be the church, or the body of believers.

"When Thou Thy kingdom shall obtain
And put Thy glory on,
Thine endless reign shall be their reign,
The King and they are one."

In the teaching of Jesus the kingdom was a fundamental thought, and all through his ministry he kept it prominently before the people. He taught that he was sent to "preach the good tidings of the kingdom of God," and he also sent his disciples "forth to preach the kingdom of God." On one occasion when the multitudes followed him, "He welcomed them, and spake to them of the kingdom of God." He taught that he appointed unto his disciples a kingdom, that they may eat and drink at his table in his kingdom; that it was his Father's good pleasure to give them "the kingdom;" and that the qualification for seeing "the kingdom of God," was being born anew, or born from above. He also teaches that when certain signs shall take place, we may know "that the kingdom of God is nigh." One writer, Schmid, seeing the kingdom so often referred to in the teachings of Jesus, and so much based upon it, and so many inferences and lessons drawn from it, designates it, "the groundwork of his teaching." Now it cannot be right, it must, indeed, be wrong, and it must be displeasing to God and damaging to the interests of truth for that subject to have the least prominence given to it in the teachings of the church, which has the most prominence given to it in the teachings of Christ. This looks like an attempt to reverse the divine order, and to set a higher estimate on man's wisdom than on God's wisdom.

The apostles, receiving the teachings of their Master and following his example, also teach the doctrine of the kingdom. They teach that God "will build again the tabernacle of David;" that the kingdom will be restored to Israel; that there shall be a "restoration of all things;" and that Christ is "appointed heir of all things." And they associate the time of his reign with his second advent; they speak of "his appearing and his kingdom." They teach that God "calleth you into his own kingdom and glory;" that he has promised that they who love him shall be "heirs of the kingdom;" that they who have faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, and love of the brethren, shall have supplied unto them "the entrance into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ."

And we are warranted in assuming that when the apostles taught the doctrine of the kingdom, they taught it intelligently. They understood whereof they affirmed. This we conclude from the words of Christ in Matt. xiii. 11; Mark iv. 11: "Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven." "Unto you is given the mystery of the kingdom of God." This was doubtless the mystery referred to by Paul in Rom. xvi. 25, 26. "According to the revelation of the mystery which hath been kept in silence through times eternal, but now is manifested." We may learn from this that God had the plan of his kingdom, and the gospel of the kingdom in his mind from the beginning; but it was revealed or made known to the apostles. Though a mystery once, in the sense of being concealed, it was then made manifest, discovered, or published.

But the statement that the mysteries of the kingdom were made known to the apostles, and which implies that until then they were not made known, may seem to conflict with the assertion that the doctrine of the kingdom was taught in the Old Testament. There is no real discord between the statements. Holy men in Old Testament times taught the kingdom; but they did not teach it so fully as it was taught in the New Testament times. Some things were hidden from the writers of the Old, which were made known to the writers of the New Testament. The calling of the Gentiles, the translation or rapture of the saints, and some other matters were no doubt among the mysteries, which were kept secret under the old dispensation, but which were manifested under the new dispensation. Still while it is revealed as a fact that the living saints shall be translated at the coming of Jesus, there are things connected with the translation which we shall not understand till the time shall come. The same may be said of the resurrection. The same indeed may be said of other things. Many things have been revealed as things which shall come to pass, and something of their nature and purpose has been made known; so that in this sense they have ceased to be mysteries: yet there will be included in them, or attaching to them, what to us will be mysterious till the coming of the future age and kingdom.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Left Lanark the 5th of March, stopped in Broadhead and visited my mother and sister, commenced meeting in Browntown Friday night, March 6, and continued until the 10th. Our meetings were very interesting and much interest was manifested. A number will soon become obedient. I stopped at Monroe and visited old time friends, Brother McCalla and wife, Brother Noble and wife; found them firm in the faith, waiting for the salvation that is to be brought at the revelation of Jesus Christ. I returned to Lanark Friday, March 12, commenced meeting the same night and continued until Thursday night. At this time my cold became so bad that we had to give over; we postponed our meetings till Monday night, the 22nd, when my cold being better, we resumed our meetings again. There was some interest manifested, so we continued our meetings in Lanark till Friday night, March 26, without any particular demonstrations that truth had taken effect. One made confession of his belief in the truth and avowed his intention of soon becoming obedient thereunto.

Saturday, March 27, went to East Plum River. Met with the brethren Sunday. The roads being so bad we could not have any meeting during the week, Monday, the 28th of March, went into the neighborhood of the Union church. On the 30th preached Brother Simon P. Renner's funeral sermon at the church. On April 2nd preached Brother McGinnis' funeral at his house. Sunday, April 4th, met with the brethren at the Union church. Next day visited with friends in the vicinity. Tuesday, April 6th, started for Gladbrook, Iowa, having 10 miles to go to the railroad through mud, water and snow. Got to Carroll in time for the noon freight and took it to Ravanna. Here I stopped to visit an old time friend, Mr. Keester, who lives there and follows fishing for a livelihood. Here I spent one day with him on the waters of the Mississippi, having a pleasant visit with him and his amiable wife. Mr. Keester believes the truth but holds it in disobedience.

Thursday morning I resumed my journey. Here I witnessed the greatest change of my life, leaving snow, mud and water at 4 o'clock in the morning and by 10 o'clock I was where it was dry, the farmers all in the fields at work, plowing, sowing and harrowing, the roads good and everything pleasant. Visited with brethren at Gladbrook till Sunday. Had two meetings; everybody was so busy farming that we had no meeting evenings. Left Gladbrook Monday morning. I am now at Alden. Had meeting last night. The brethren here have procured the use of the Methodist church to hold meetings in. Written at Alden, Iowa, April 13, 1886. Yours in hope of eternal life at the appearing of the King in his beauty.

OBITUARY.

RENNER.—Simon P. Renner, age of Brother David Renner, departed this life March 29, aged 15 years and 8 months.

He was baptized into Christ in January, since which time he has lived in the full triumph of a living faith, though a great sufferer. A sermon was delivered at the Union church to a large and attentive audience, from Rom. viii. 1, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit.

T. J. WHITEMITT.

McGINNIS.—Brother Frank McGinnis departed this life March 31, 1886, at his home near the Union church, Jo Davis Co., Ill., aged 36 years and 21 days.

He was born in Alleghany County, Pa., March 8, 1809; came to Illinois in 1841 and settled in Jo Davis County in 1842, where he resided till the time of his death. He was one of the pioneers of Illinois, raised a large family, five of whom are living, one son and four daughters. He lived to have born to him 53 grand children and 30 great grand children, the greater part of whom are still living. He embraced the faith about 1844, since which time he has lived a consistent Christian life, has been a pillar in the church. The church has sustained a great loss in his death. A sermon was preached on the occasion by the writer from 2 Thess. v. 9, 10, to a large concourse of friends and relatives. We then committed him to the tomb to rest till the resurrection morn.

Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep,
A calm and undisturbed repose,
Unbroken by the last of foes.

NOTICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS.

The book is truthful, reverent and instructive, every way worthy of the attention of those who prefer calm argument to sensational speculation.—The Rainbow.

We are desirous to express our sympathy with the general scope of the book, and to bespeak for it a wide and cordial reception.—The Messenger.

The volume before us is evidently the product of a thoughtful mind, and deserves the careful study of every Christian, being of a very comprehensive character, and based on Scripture. Certainly it is the best work on the subject which has come under our notice.—The Sydney Observer.

The treatment shows that the author has studied well and patiently digested his theme before writing upon it, and we feel as we read page after page, stimulated rather than clogged in our inquiry.....The aim of the volume before us is to set the truth clearly before the mind, and to restore to its place in the consciousness of the church the hope that was once so dear to God's suffering saints, and is still so to many, but which is alas unwelcome to a worldly, cold and formal church, and hated by the world. This little volume will be received and read with pleasure by all who take interest in prophetic subjects.—Rev. Nathaniel West, D. D.

THE COMING AGE,

—1886—

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WEETHEE.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

IN MEMORIAM.

Brethren and Friends, our mortality is again made painfully evident to us, death having snatched another one of our loved ones. This time it is a sister with whom we have often taken sweet counsel, and whose name was enrolled with those who first came together as a Church of God in Cleveland. Although she had long before embraced the glorious truths respecting the coming and kingdom of our Lord, and of Life and Immortality only through him, it was my privilege, more than twenty years ago, to assist her in putting on Christ, by baptism for the remission of sins. From that time to the close of her pilgrimage, I think it might be said of her with great truth, that she lived a life of faith on the Son of God.

As you have assembled here to testify to your love and esteem for the one now silent in death, I am certain you can honor her memory so well in no way, as by listening to an outline of the faith and hope that sustained her in all the trials of life, and lost none of its power in the hour of death.

In order to solve the problem of human destiny, she first diverted herself, as far as possible, of human traditions. Realizing that she must be taught of God if she would know anything with certainty concerning the nature of her existence, her only resource was the Immutable Word; and just where the good God first tells us how he made man, she made the discovery, that, instead of being in possession of an immortal nature, she was altogether mortal and corruptible; that instead of an unending existence, she was dust, and to dust she would assuredly return, for the mouth of the Lord had spoken it. These discoveries were anything but flattering to human nature; but, as in physical ailments it is a great point gained when the disease is certainly located, and its nature defined, so in this great moral and religious diagnosis, when we know what we are, when we know what we are not, when we know that a remedy must be found or else we shall sooner or later perish in our own corruption, then it is we are qualified to accept a proffered remedy. The same book of God also explains that it was disobedience that stamped corruptibility upon our race. Death was fairly threatened beforehand, as the penalty, and therefore man sinned wilfully, and was instantly excluded from the Tree of Life, and the execution of the penalty thus assured; man must die, and the Almighty One explains the death threatened; to be a return to the dust from whence he had been taken. At this point, our sister saw that in the infancy of our race there were other, and great possibilities. She saw that if disobedience excluded man from the Tree of Life and deprived him of the existence with which God had endowed him, then, obedience would have opened and assured to him, life in an unending degree. But disobedience had changed everything. Mankind would be born, live, die and bid an eternal good-by to existence, unless the Creator provide a remedy—unless he devise means by which man could live again. And this, dear friends, is just what the good God did. His law must be honored, man must die, but he is a God of love still, and had a desire for the work of his hands. For myriads of ages he had been storing up in the bowels of the earth everything man would ever need for his use and comfort. He was not willing that man, created in the image of the Elohim, should utterly perish, and thus frustrate his grand designs. He would provide a Savior, one able to save. He would not reveal him for thousands of years, but he would promise a Savior, and this promise of a Savior would appeal to man's faith and obedience once more. Man's acceptance of this Savior would not prevent his dying, but it would assure his living again, and secure him life forevermore. And the blessed God allowed no time to elapse before he disclosed his gracious proposition. The Gospel to our first parents was, that the Seed of the Woman should bruise the Serpent's head. This was the substance of the whole gospel in a sentence; it embraced all the exceeding great and precious promises by which the apostle says we are made partakers of the Divine nature. Faith in this remote Savior inspired confidence in Abel, and Enoch, and Noah, and enabled them to walk with God. They accepted Heaven's formula, they embraced the World's Deliverer by faith, and showed by their works that they were not living for what could be extracted from this present life, but for the future. And I dare affirm, that they lived lives of faith on the world's promised Redeemer.

Ages passed, and Jehovah made choice of Abraham as the Savior of the race through whom this Seed should come, and so far divulged his purpose as to announce that in him and his seed all the families of the earth should be blessed; and as a further clue to his purpose, promised to that seed the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession. How much more was revealed to Abraham we do not know, but we are told by the Redeemer himself in the eighth chapter of John and fifty-sixth verse, that "Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it and was glad." You observe, he was a party to the covenant; it was to him and his seed, who you will see, by reference to Gal. iii. 16, was Christ.

We now pass down the stream of time till we come to David, king of Israel, and find the Great Jehovah promising to him, and confirming it with an oath, that he shall have an immortal Son who shall sit upon his throne of Israel forever. And I wish to impress this fact upon your minds, that the Woman's Seed, the Serpent-Bruiser, the Seed of Abraham who should bless all nations, and to whom the land was promised for an everlasting possession, and the Seed of David, who should reign upon his throne forever, are one and the same seed. See 2 Sam. vii. 12–14; Psalms cxxxii. 11; 2 Sam. xxii. 1, 3 5; and furthermore, that this seed of the woman, of Abraham, and of David, is also the Son of God. In the seventh chapter of Samuel, already referred to, and the fourteenth verse, these words form part of the promise of God respecting this immortal Son:—"I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son; and in a prophecy concerning him in the eighty-ninth Psalm, it is said of him, "He shall cry unto me, Thou art my Father, and the rock of my salvation; also, I (Jehovah) will make him my first-born, higher than the kings of the earth. My mercy will I keep for him forevermore, and my covenant shall stand fast with him. His seed also will I make to endure forever, and his throne as the days of Heaven. This is infallible proof that David's greater Son and heir was also to be the Son of God, and whatsoever else his destiny, he was to be king of Israel on David's throne. And it is added in the 34th, 35th and 36th verses of this same 89th Psalm, "My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips, once have I sworn by my holiness, that I will not lie unto David, his seed shall endure forever, and his throne as the sun before me. It shall be established forever as the moon, and as a faithful witness in Heaven."

It remains now for me to prove that this promised Son of David and to-be-king of Israel on David's throne, is no other than Christ the Lord, the world's Redeemer; and I am happy to believe that I can furnish testimony that will not be questioned. I first invite your attention to the first chapter of Luke's gospel. The fullness of time had rolled around, and the angel Gabriel was sent by God unto a city of Galilee, named Nazareth, to a Virgin espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David, and the virgin's name was Mary. And the angel came in unto her, and said, Hail, thou that art highly favored, the Lord is with thee; blessed art thou among women. And when she saw him, she was troubled at his saying, and cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be. And the angel said unto her, Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found favor with God, and, behold, thou shalt conceive and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus; he shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." My friends, the point is proven, we have certainly found him of whom Moses and the prophets did write. Remember, it was the woman's seed, not man's seed, that was to bruise the Serpent's head. It was to Abraham and his seed the promise was made that all the families of the earth should be blessed in them; it was to king David's seed the throne and kingdom of Israel were promised, and Isaiah the prophet had given a sign worthy of the God who inspired him, for he had said in his seventh chapter and fourteenth verse, "Behold a Virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel. You have listened to the testimony of Luke already, in proof of this, and one passage more, from the second chapter of Acts must suffice. Says Peter on the day of Pentecost, "God had sworn with an oath to David, that he would raise up Christ, to sit on his (David's) throne."

Agreeable to this wonderful chain of God's truth, we, in the second chapter of Matthew, read as follows:—"Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem, of Judea, in the days of Herod the king, behold there came wise men from the East to Jerusalem, saying, where is he that is born King of the Jews, for we have seen his star in the East and are come to worship him. Now let me ask, after seeing what God had promised concerning this Son of God, who was also to be David's Lord, is it any wonder that Herod slew all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coast thereof from two years old and under? Is it any wonder, I say, that when Peter asked what they were to have who had left all and followed him, that the blessed Lord should answer in the words of Matthew xix. 28. "Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed me,—in the regeneration, when the son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel?" Is it any wonder, after what we have seen of Jehovah's purpose in Christ, that when he was accused before Pilate, and asked if he were a king, that he should answer, "To this end was I born?" Is it any wonder that he should be put to death for claiming to be king of the Jews, when no other pretense could be found? Is it any wonder that just before the ascension of our Lord the apostles should say to him, "Lord, wilt thou at this time, restore again the kingdom to Israel? On the other hand, is it not a wonder, that the Lord did not correct them if they cherished wrong notions about the nature and locality of his kingdom? It certainly is; but instead of censure his answer is a tacit acknowledgement that their expectations were founded in truth. They had no doubts about the fact of its restoration, it was the time of its restoration, they queried about, and were answered as follows:—"It is not for you to know the time or the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power." What times or seasons? The only answer possible, is, the times and seasons when the kingdom would be restored to Israel under him who was born to be king of the Jews, whose right it is.

But what made it necessary to restore the throne? The Lord had subverted it because of the wickedness of the people; listen to the overturning edict, by the pen of Ezekiel, chapter xxi. 25:—"And thou profane, wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come when iniquity shall have an end, thus saith the Lord God, remove the diadem, and take off the crown, this shall not be the same, exalt him that is low, abase him that is high, I will overturn, overturn, overturn it, (the Throne of David) and it shall be no more until he come, whose right it is, and I will give it him." Here both the overturning and the restoration are plainly set forth; and please observe, that that which was overturned, is to be restored, not something else; and hence we are prepared to read what the evangelist pathetically says, "He came unto his own, and his own received him not;" and then, as predicted of him ages before, his Father invited him to spend the interim at the court of Heaven, saying, "Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thy foes thy footstool," see Psa. cx., and the second chapter of Acts. And when the time rolls around to restore all that God's prophets have predicted, we learn positively that God will then send Jesus. See Acts iii. 19, 20,

I would now remind you that the Son of God and Son of David traveled up and down the hills and valleys of Judea, telling the people that the kingdom of God was coming, and crowds of the common people rejoiced when assured by his mighty works that the promised Messiah had at least appeared, and would have crowned him on the spot. Jesus, too, had taught his disciples to pray, "Thy kingdom come." He sent out the twelve and seventy to make the same announcement, and before his ascension the Lord commissioned them to go into all the world and proclaim the same glad tidings; and after his ascension to his Father, we find Philip and Paul, and Peter and others, carrying the good message of the kingdom everywhere, even at the risk of their lives.

In view, then, of all the promises of God, and the predictions of the prophets about the Son of David and the throne of his everlasting kingdom, what other kingdom of God could they preach about? Zechariah says of this great King, "The Lord shall be king over all the earth." And Daniel says that the kingdom which the God of Heaven shall set up, will break in pieces and consume all other kingdoms and stand forever, and is to be under the whole heaven. There cannot be two everlasting and universal kingdoms on earth, in the nature of things. And the fact is, the Bible is the book of the kingdom, and kingdoms. No matter in what part of the book you read it, it is always the same kingdom of God, and had we time to consult the prophets concerning that age of glory, when God's beloved Son shall be king over all the earth, we could show that the curse will be removed, the earth will yield an increase, all shall know the Lord from the least to the greatest, and from every hill and valley shall ascend to him one universal anthem of praise for everything that has breath shall praise the Lord.

Does a cloud of darkness now gather before your minds, my friends? Are you thinking of your old Adam, that we left to go back to dust? Are you thinking of the myriads who have lived, and whose memories are forgotten? Are you wondering if from this new standpoint any ray of light will beam upon the death state? Are you desiring arising what possible benefit can return to mankind from some far off promised good, since one generation rapidly chases another out of existence? If so, you may find relief here and now! I say you may slacken the tension at once, by just believing God!! And first, believe he tells you the truth as to how he made man, and the nature of his existence; and when you once believe that man was at first only a candidate for immortality, and that success depended upon Obedience, you will see that disobedience left him to perish; and you will be prepared to believe him when he says, "The dead know not anything;" Eccl. ix. 5, 6; that man's "breath goeth forth, and in that very day his thoughts perish;" Psa. cxlvi. 4; that "the dead praise not the Lord," neither any that go down into silence; Psa. cxv. 17. And when once freed from the immortal soul teaching, you will be prepared to listen to the grandest announcement from Heaven. "The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." From this we learn that the son of David has other offices than that of King of Israel, although the prospective glitter of the crown so dazzled the eyes of the Jewish people that they could see nothing else. Their minds had become so morally obtuse that they saw no connection between the typical blood of bulls and goats, and the antitypical blood of the Lamb. But for all that, Eternal Life, God's gift, comes to us through the one anointed to be king of Israel on David's throne. The verse which makes this announcement, says, "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord." Wages imply a compensation, a recompense for something done. Disobedience earned the wages here designated, death. Death, observe, not life, misery, death, not eternal torment, is what God declares to be the wages of sin. Man earned death and therefore deserved it. And having put eternal life quite out of his reach, he must take it as a gift, if he ever obtain it. Purchase is out of the question.

Now, how can God bestow eternal life upon one who is under the sentence of death? How can he bestow eternal life as a gift upon one who has earned death? How can the Great God be just, and at the same time the Justifier? If he be just, the penalty of the law is executed; man dies, loses his life, ceases to be; and, in the words of the judge in passing the sentence, "Dust thou (Adam) art, and unto dust shalt thou return." This is where justice lands him. He is dust then, not man. Is there any space for justification? Is there anything to justify? No! And if Jehovah cannot justify wrong doing, in God's own description of the final end of the wicked in Obadiah, 16th verse, "They shall be as though they had never been!" But oh, my friends, this is where the wisdom and goodness of God shines forth. Paul in the third chapter of Romans furnishes a key to unlock this great truth. He informs us that God is the justifier of him who believes in Jesus. And this Jesus, in all his loveliness, is held up as the object of faith, and if the sinner believe in him, it does not stay the execution of the law of death, but it entitles him to live again after he has paid the penalty, by dying.

You observe that every son of Adam partakes of his Father's Nature, and is entirely mortal. Death overtakes all. There is no way to escape. But although we all die in Adam, we are not compelled to remain in death. Our continuance in the death state, or rescue from it, depends entirely upon ourselves; if we descend to the grave with actual sin of our own upon us unpardoned sin makes us amenable to the judgment, and consigns us to the second death, from which there is no recovery or reprieve. If our sins be pardoned, we shall live forever, for the gift of God is eternal life,—just what we need, and what no one else could bestow; and it is bestowed through Jesus Christ our Lord.

But on what principle is this inestimable boon bestowed in Christ? Without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin. The blood of bulls and goats could not put away sin. It required one in whom the blood of our own race coursed. And besides that, it must be the blood of one who knew no sin. Where should such an one be found? There was none such: the Eternal One knew there never would be, and so the great promise said that the woman's seed should bruise the Serpent's head. Turn to the first chapter of Luke again, at your leisure, and see how the Son of Mary became the Son of God. This was he, termed by Paul, the Second Adam, on whom the destiny of our race was hanging. Would he fall to stand the test like Adam the first? No! Blessed be God, he knew no sin; his blood was accepted as a sacrifice, and having paid the penalty of the law himself, and having no sin of his own to hold him in death, God was justified in raising him from death to die no more. This he did; and more—constituted him the Prince of Life. And knowing before what the Divine purpose in him, and through him was, we find him at the grave of Lazarus making an announcement that should thrill every mortal to whom all traces of faith in God has not become extinct. Listen to him, fellow mortals! "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." This illustrates how eternal life, God's gift, comes through Jesus Christ our Lord. He knew he would be God's first-born from the dead, of all the sons of men, because it had been said of him by his Father's prophet, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hades, neither wilt thou suffer thine holy one to see corruption." Psa. xvi. 8, 9, 10. He knew from the same source that his father David had called him Lord, and he desired would be satisfied when he should awake in his likeness. Psa. xvii. 15: "Yes, I am the resurrection and the life!" What an announcement to dying man!! Why, life was exactly what he had forfeited. Life was exactly what he needed; and, oh, friends, it comes from the God he had disobeyed; and, better than all, to those who could not purchase it, it comes as a gift through Jesus Christ our Lord! What amazing grace! What transcendent love, "for God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life."

But to select another line of truth, we remark that children are the heirs of their father—to the estate of their father. God has only one begotten Son; and we learn from the first chapter of Hebrews, that God has appointed him heir of all things. But here, again, the love of God stands out in cold relief. He has ordained a formula by which he can legally adopt other children, and bestow upon them all the rights and immunities of begotten children; they become joint-heirs with Christ, co-partners with the only begotten Son. And, of course, being children of the same father, they are brethren of the Lord Jesus Christ. Abundance of Scriptures sustain these assertions. For instance, in the eighth chapter of Romans, we read, "As many as are led by the spirit of God, they are the sons of God. For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba Father; the spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God; and if children, then heirs, heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ, (if so be that we suffer with him), that we may be also glorified together! But to what are we heirs? From Titus iii. 7, we learn that we are heirs according to the hope of eternal life. This, the Elder Brother possesses. We are heirs of it through him. Heb. i. 14, shows we are heirs of salvation. Gal. iii. 29, says, "ye are heirs according to the promise." The only begotten Son has had a great promise made to him, by the Father, and according to the word of that promise you are heirs. If you believe it. James ii. 5, says, "God has chosen the poor of this world, rich in the truth, heirs of the kingdom, which he has promised to them that love him."

We discover, then, that while Jehovah was promising the land, the throne and the world's dominion to Abraham's and David's Seed, he intended that that Seed should share its honor and glory with those to be adopted through faith in the Seed. These prospective sons were styled saints, and of them Daniel said some 550 years before the birth of the seed himself, "And the kingdom and the dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve him." And to convince all that this is as vital a truth today as ever it was, and will never be obsolete, I quote the words of the Spirit in Revelations: John was privileged with a scenic representation of the redeemed hosts after they had been raised from the dead, and wrapped around with immortality, and heard them sing; and this was the burden of their song, "Thou art worthy to take the book and to open the seals thereof, for thou wast slain, and has redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation, and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth." And the Lord of life and glory himself said, in that incomparable sermon on the mount, "The meek shall inherit the earth;" and after his ascension he whispered back to the beloved John, so that he could give us the message, "He that overcometh, and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations, and he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers, even as I have received of my Father." The promise of this world-wide and everlasting kingdom, then, is just the same as the promise of everlasting life, because it involves everlasting life. And when Jesus and his Apostles preached the gospel of the kingdom, it was simply the good news from God that the long promised kingdom was certainly coming—that God had not changed his purpose or forgotten his word, but, as the beginning of the sublime end in view, when the whole earth shall be full of his glory, the seed had come to confirm the promise of God to the fathers, and to be led as a lamb to the slaughter.

Those who believed the good message, concluded that the kingdom of God would immediately appear. This idea was corrected by the parable of the nobleman going to a far country to receive a kingdom, and to return. He has gone to that far country, my friends, and has not yet returned, but he will return, for he said before he started on the journey; and after a cloud had received him out of the sight of the apostles, and while they stood gazing steadfastly toward heaven, as he went up, behold two men stood by them in white apparel, which also said, "ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven, this same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner, as ye have seen him go into heaven." Besides this, the spirit said of him, in Acts xv. 16, "After this I will return, and build again the tabernacle of David." And in the closing words of Revelations, he says, "Surely I come quickly," and John adds, amen, even so, come, Lord Jesus, and so say we—we are waiting for him.

These are some of the things most surely believed by the loved one who lies unconscious before you, and by those with whom she was associated. It is necessarily very brief, but I hope in God that enough has been said to kindle a desire in some to know more of God's truth on this vital subject. Depend upon it, we too, are mortal. A very few more summer's suns, and the race will be over with us. We entreat those still out of Christ to lay hold of the hope set before them in the gospel. It is life, eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord, together with all the glories of the everlasting kingdom. Will you accept it? Will you spurn from you God's great gift? God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish, but have everlasting life. Love is the motive power of the gospel. Does not the love of the Father and the Son constrain you? Witness his agony in the garden; he is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death. He falls upon his face and prays, Oh, my Father, if this cup may not pass from me, except I drink it, thy will be done. See him shamefully treated before Caiaphas and Pilate. See him nailed to the shameful tree; hear him pray for his murderers. "Father forgive them, they know not what they do," and then ask yourselves if it be not true, that "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him, might not perish, but have everlasting life." Can you resist such love as this? I entreat you to remember that "the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is Eternal Life, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

To briefly recapitulate. Eternal Life through Jesus and the resurrection, and the inheritance of God's everlasting kingdom under the whole heavens, is God's gracious offer to fallen man. This is the subject matter of the gospel; and it is this gospel that Paul says is the power of God unto salvation, because, he has promised nothing else. Faith, Repentance, Baptism, and a godly life, are the conditions on which this great salvation from death can be obtained. Jehovah fulfils his promise to those who believe his promise, and shape their lives accordingly.

To those of like precious faith with her who now mourn, I would say, cheer up, this long dark period of suffering and death will soon end. We shall soon meet again, never more to part. The great thing for us is, to watch, and keep ourselves unspotted from the world. The loved one now in death possessed many traits worthy of our emulation. Few women stamp their individuality upon their surroundings as she did; certainly none do it more naturally or inoffensively. While most unobtrusive in her department, she yet possessed a wealth of resource when necessity called for it, that would astonish the casual observer. Indeed, she was so constituted, that it was only great disappointments, great perplexities, great provocations and mortifications, that exhibited her moral worth. At such times her courage was sublime, and her faith in God that all things would work together for good to them that loved him, most implicit. Said the Lord Jesus, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." I remember no one with whom I have come in contact, who impressed me more with the thought that purity of heart was a distinguishing trait of his or her character. The close observer of human nature need not be told that the impure in heart disclose their impurity by their readiness to impute it to others; or to believe, on the slightest evidence, in the impurity of other people's motives. Of our beloved sister the opposite of all this was true. In her presence, the absent accused, or suspected person never wanted a friend. Every possible excuse for age or infirmities, or ignorance, or educational prejudices or other ameliorating circumstances would be exhausted, in the absence of direct proof, before she could credit them with impure motives.

For many years she was in delicate health; few knew the extent of her sufferings at times, so patient and uncomplaining was she. Some two years ago, when a crisis in her case seemed inevitable, the same calm spirit of confidence and resignation so manifest through life was still in the ascendency, for the message forwarded to us was, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." And you will have often remarked, that when her poetic temperment found expression in verse, redeeming love, as evinced by the death of the anointed Jesus, and the great promises pertaining to the kingdom of God were her constant theme. So unselfish was she, that it might be said of her, she lived for others, for, to the last, her desire to live was inspired by a tender solicitude for the welfare of those dependent upon her, as well as those who seemed to have been her special wards.

Oh! yes, brethren and sisters, I feel assured that she will see God; and it would be wise in us to resolve to meet her, and all the Israel of God, in the goodly land, and be of that happy number who will hear Jesus say, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." What a foothold our faith has in the immutable promises of God. "Oh, what a charm to the renewed mind, is there in the things laid up for them who love God. The more our faith feeds on Christ, the more peace and comfort we have." "The more our hopes cluster around the city of the Living God, the crown of unfading glory," and an immortal and glorified existence in the kingdom of God's dear Son, the stronger we shall be for the battle with the world, the flesh and the devil, and so overcome, and unite with the faithful of all ages in singing unto him that loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and made us kings and priests unto God and his Father. To him be glory and dominion forever and ever.

What exalted privileges we have. "We were under condemnation, but

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

NOTES ON ANASTASIS.—NO. 8.

On pages 28 and 29, speaking of those who deny "mortal emergence," he says, "They deny that the bodies of the just and the unjust in the coming forth are alike. Perhaps they would admit that the bodies of the unjust come forth mortal, but not the just. These, they affirm, are generated in the dust, incorruptible and immortal, and come forth as perfect as they will ever be."

Here I wish to state positively and distinctly that we are not told anything regarding the process of resurrection in the Bible. "The dead shall be raised incorruptible," is not telling us how it shall be done. It is asserted as a work of the Great Omnipotent, just as much as when we are told that he said, "Let there be light, and there was light." We are not told how the light was made, simply that he said, "Let there be light." Neither are we told how he exercises his supreme power in calling forth the dead, simply that they are "raised incorruptible." We are nowhere told that either mortal or immortal bodies are "generated in the dust of sheol."

Romans viii. 11 is next quoted to try to prove that the quickening of the mortal bodies there referred to by Paul, implies that the mortal bodies of all God's saints shall be brought forth from their graves in mortal flesh. By carefully reading this chapter from the 1st to the 12th verse, it will appear perfectly plain that the apostle is not here speaking of resurrection at all, but of the two conditions in the present life; one he calls walking after the flesh, the other walking after the spirit; and then he assures them that they are not in the flesh, (evidently under the influence of the flesh) but in the spirit. "If so be that the spirit of God dwelleth in you. But if any man hath not the spirit of Christ he is none of his. And if Christ be in you the body is dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of righteousness. But if the spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwelleth in you, he that raised up Jesus Christ from the dead shall quicken also your mortal bodies by his spirit that dwelleth in you." This whole reference points to the condition of the saints under the quickening influences of the Holy Spirit, while in the present mortal state.

1 Cor. vi. 14 is also quoted, "And God hath both raised the Lord and will raise up us through his power." Of this the author says, "This is affirmed of all saints, of all generations." Very true it is, and still further it is true that he will not raise up his saints in mortal, corruptible bodies. Then the author asks, "Did Paul mean the 'mortal bodies' of the saints living at the time he penned these words. If he did, were they ever quickened? No, instead of having life imparted to their mortal bodies, they lost even the life they had in common with all flesh. And where are said mortal bodies now? Body is a congeries of organs in the image of Deity. Where are these bodies? They are nowhere. Only a little dust remains of them in sheol, and unorganized dust is not body. What then is necessary that Paul's words may come to pass? Manifestly, that the saints reappear as mortal bodies, so that when they have come forth, corruptible and mortal, 'This corruptible may put on incorruption, and this mortal may put on immortality, by the spirit or power of Deity who quickens.'"

As agreeing with the view I have already given of Rom. viii., and more fully to show the gross misapplication of these texts, I will quote from Eph. ii. 1–7, And you HE he quicken who were dead through your trespasses and sins; wherein aforetime ye walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, of the spirit that now worketh in the sons of disobedience: among whom we also all once lived in the lusts of our flesh, and of the mind, and were by nature the children of wrath, even as the rest. But God, being rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead through our trespasses, quickened us together with Christ, (by grace ye are saved;) and raised up us with him, and made us to sit in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus; that in the ages to come he might show the exceeding riches of his grace in kindness toward us in Christ Jesus; for by grace have ye been saved through faith; and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God. Surely this is sufficient evidence to show that it was the quickening or influencing of the saints by the spirit, to walk after the teachings of the spirit while in this mortal condition, that Paul referred to in all these texts.

Still further the author of Anastasis goes on with the most unwarranted speculations, and speaking of Paul say, "Again he teaches that the life of Jesus is intended for manifestation in our bodies or mortal flesh. The troubles, perplexities and persecutions the saints endure on account of the truth he styles, bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, in order that the life of Jesus might be manifested in their mortal flesh. 2 Cor. iv. 10–11. The phrase 'the life of Jesus,' is expressive of his mortal example or conduct, and the life power of his resurrection. Paul requires that both these be manifested in our mortal flesh. (I would rather say the author of mortal emergence requires it.) The Deity has predestined that all saints who would attain to life eternal, be conformed to the image of his Son, both to his moral and material image. But the moral conformity must precede the corporeal. We are buried with him by baptism into death, that we should walk in newness of life—the life of Jesus; and by virtue of this come to be planted in the likeness of his resurrection. Rom. vi. 4, 5 and viii. 29; and Phil. iii. 10. But where is the mortal flesh of the saints of past generations, in which the resurrection life of Jesus may be manifested? There is no flesh pertaining to them in existence. There is nothing of them remains but their characters in the divine register and a little dust. It is evident then that the mortal flesh must be created and pre-resurrectional consciousness flashed upon it that the saints of Rome and Corinth may experience the life of Jesus in their mortal flesh."

This paragraph, made up of such incongruous sentences, must appear to every student of the word out of that divine harmony which marks the entire revelation of Jehovah. 2 Cor. iv. 10, 11 reads, Always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be manifested in our body. For we which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus might be manifested in our mortal flesh. It must be evident to every intelligent mind that the life of Jesus here referred to is his character of goodness, patience, humility, long suffering—the embodiment of all the Christian graces—which he exemplified in his life while in mortal flesh, and which we are exhorted to imitate as closely as possible, while we are in mortal flesh. He has gone before, he has attained to immortality; and we are told that when he shall appear we shall be like him. Then that which is in part, or imperfect will have passed and that which is perfect will have come. This and this life only is our state of trial, of probation. There is no purgatory awaiting God's saints in the glorious immortal future. Whatever the language presenting such a thought, it is not found in the written word.

Where, I ask, in the entire range of inspiration, are we taught that "Deity has predestined that all saints that would attain to life eternal be conformed to the image of his Son, both to his moral and material image"? To be conformed to the material image (which is the physical, the corporeal) of Jesus, would be simply to be made exactly as he was, in size, weight, complexion, height, and of course in years also, as an old man cannot be said to be in the physical image of a man thirty or forty years old. Neither can a woman of eighty years be said to be in the corporeal image of a man who had not reached his prime. Is it not manifest to every thinking mind that such speculative sophism will inevitably lead away from the sure foundation? Then I say, in the spirit of prophecy found and true Christian zeal, "To the winds with all such human wisdom, that in its over anxiety to be wise, goes beyond all that is written and searching out the vain imaginations of the fleshly mind, endeavors to bring down the wondrous works of the All Wise from their sublime attitude to fit the finite grasp of poor, frail mortals while in the flesh.

Romans vi. 4, 5 and viii. 2, and Phil. iii. 10 are referred to. I give the several texts that we may apprehend their true import. 1st. "We were buried therefore with him through baptism unto death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also might walk in newness of life. For if we have been united with him by the likeness of his death, we shall be also by the likeness of his resurrection." Surely even a babe in Christ must see that in this we are taught, that being conformed to the same life of obedience that Christ here lived while we are in this life, assures to us that same union with him in the resurrection state and the life to come. 2nd. "For whom he foreknew he also foreordained to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among the brethren." No one can question that it is the spiritual image of Christ that is here referred to, and not his material image. 3rd. "That I may know him and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, becoming conformed unto his death, if by any means I may attain unto the resurrection of the dead. In the preceding context Paul is showing in some sort what his life had been before he came to a knowledge of the Christ. How, as touching the law, he was blameless, etc., yet when he came to a knowledge of salvation through faith in Christ, he counted [illegible] gins to seeking a more perfect [illegible] edge of him and of living out his character as nearly as possible in conformity to the character of Christ, resting his hope of resurrection on the obedience of faith. In none of these texts is there the faintest shadow of proof of the theory advocated in Anastasis, yet the author continues, "Again Paul teaches in 2 Cor. v. 4, We would not be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life; the thing to be clothed upon is the mortal, which is another word for mortal flesh, or mortal body or body of death. This is the thing to be clothed upon with this house from heaven; or in other words, Incorruptibility and life. But where is the mortal thing to be swallowed up? The dust in sheol is not mortal being devoid of any kind of life. The dust is incorruptible and would continue as it is, and as it has been for thousands of years, without change indefinitely. It is not the incorruptible that is to be swallowed up of life but the mortal. It is evident then that the thing that comes forth from the grave must be mortal flesh or body and that it is this which is to be "clothed upon" or put on incorruptibility and life in being quickened after judgment." 2 Cor. v. 4 reads, "For indeed we that are in this tabernacle do groan being burdened; not that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life."

In this text, as well as what precedes and follows, Paul is speaking of the wonderful change that awaits all of God's saints, and the burden of all his thoughts seems to be to attain to that glorious change from a state of corruptibility to a state of incorruptibility. He here uses a figure of speech, "clothed upon," which we can take only as referring to an entirely new existence, for we cannot for a moment suppose that these mortal bodies are to be clothed with immortality as we now robe them in earthly garments. If we force language in this case to signify just what the words express; then we must suppose that the mortal body is unwrapped or covered with immortality, while it, the mortal body, remains inside, and is the thing clothed, enveloped or robed. Such a thought would be too preposterous, and entirely at variance with the whole tenor of the book and its divine teachings. Therefore we accept this as in harmony with all else revealed pertaining to future life, i. e., a presentation of the two different conditions and contrasting them: the present in which we groan under the weight of mortality with all its ills, the future as free from all ill, being the consummation of all our brightest hopes. There is no note taken of the time that intervenes between death and the resurrection. The putting off of this tabernacle is death as is clearly taught in 2 Peter i. 13, 14. And I think it right as long as I am in this tabernacle to stir you up by putting you in remembrance, knowing that the putting off of my tabernacle cometh swiftly, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath signified unto me.

Further quotation, "From these promises it may be seen whether mortal resurrection is taught directly or indirectly in the Scriptures or not. I have shown that it is; and furthermore that it is in perfect harmony with all Paul's teachings as exhibited in all his writings that have come down to us." Notwithstanding this bold assertion, as yet there has not been given one "thus saith the Lord" to prove mortal resurrection, while we have over and over again quoted Paul's own words, "the dead shall be raised incorruptible" and "we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye." These Scriptures cannot be broken down by all the weight of human distortion, speculation and would-be philosophy that can be brought to bear against them. "Cease then from man whose breath is in his nostrils, for wherein is he to be accounted of." Yet the author of Anastasis continues this fruitless effort and says, "I proceed now to say that the second proposition of our opponents is as foundationless as the first. They say [illegible] righteous are [illegible] such only within [illegible] half of the nineteenth century [illegible] stands on the same plane as all other modern revelations. It is not found in the written word of the Most High, and hence has no claim as a divine revelation.)

Again he says Moses and Paul both testify that Jehovah shall judge his people, Deut. xxxii. 36, and Solomon says the Elohim shall judge the righteous and the wicked. Eccl. iii. 17. This Elohistic judge is the Father and the Son in flesh manifestation justified by the Spirit. 1 Tim. iii. 16. The Father hath committed all judgment to the Son and hath given him authority to execute judgment, because he is the son of man. Jno. v. 22–27. As I hear, adds Jesus, I judge, and my judgment is just. The word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day. John xii. 48. The Lord will not condemn the righteous when he is judged. Psa. xxxvii. 33." (Note. One fact must not be lost sight of, viz., that the word judge has various shades of meaning, and these shades must of necessity be determined by the context which always shows in what sense the word is used. These different significations may be seen in any standard lexicon, but are too numerous to give here.) "He shall bring every work into judgment with every secret thing, whether good or evil. Eccl. xii. 14. Every injurious word that men shall speak they shall give an account thereof in the day of judgment (not merely when they confess in prayer). For by thy words, saith Jesus, thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned. Matt. xii. 36, 37."

Let us now carefully examine the texts above quoted, and thus be able to determine whether by them we are taught that every saint of God will be called upon individually to tell the story of their lives at the bar or tribunal of the Christ at his appearing. We take them up in the order quoted. Deut. xxxii. 36, is one verse of the song which Moses, the servant of God spoke unto the children of Israel, having led them through the wilderness, and witnessed all their murmurings and rebellions against Jehovah. He told them what they had done while he was with them as a leader; and he foretold them that after his death, which occurred that day, that they would still be a rebellious and wayward people, and then, in vers. 35 Moses says, "For the Lord will judge his people." Here none can fail to see that this verse had direct reference to the nation or people of Israel as they then existed, and that no reference is made to a final judgment of God's saints. Heb. x. 30. For we know him that said vengeance is mine, I will recompense. Here we must see that to Jehovah, and to him alone belongeth vengeance, and that he is judge of his people as he is judge of all the earth. He alone knows, and to him alone belongeth judgment and justice for they are the habitation of his throne. We find nothing in all these of the saints standing up and telling the story of their lives.

The other texts on this point will be given in next number.

MILLWOOD, Ind.

Dear Friend:

I will drop you a few lines in order to discharge my duty toward you, as a neighbor.

I confess to you that I was so terrible shocked at an idea that you advanced the other evening, that I scarcely know how to answer you. I refer to the idea that if it were not for the fear of the eternal torment and torture in hell, that you would rival the James boys in robbing and murdering your fellowmen. This idea, so unexpectedly coming from one who, for a considerable number of years, has professed to be a follower of the meek and lowly Jesus, I confess, it was extremely shocking to me. What! A Christian possessing and fostering such a perilous, avaricious, and murderous spirit as that manifested by the [illegible] boys! It is astoundingly shocking [illegible] think that a [illegible] Testament [illegible] ing forth the final destiny [illegible] orthodox hell continually before his mind, to keep him from committing the most wilful, atrocious, and the most wicked crimes imaginable, is absurd in the most extreme degree. But still I hope better things from you, notwithstanding the reproof of the Savior given his disciples on a certain occasion, might be very appropriate in your case.

"You know not what spirit you are of." Luke ix. 56. You ought to remember that God wants volunteers; hence we have the following question from Paul's pen.

"Despisest thou the riches of his (God's) goodness, and forbearance, and longsuffering; not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance? But after thy hard and impenitent heart, treasurest up unto thyself wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God; who will render unto every man according to his deeds." "To them, who, by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory, and honor, immortality; he will render eternal life." Rom. ii. 4, 7.

Hence we see that immortality is to be sought for by a patient continuance in well-doing, while "The wages of sin is death; but eternal life is the gift of God, through our Lord Jesus Christ." Rom. vi. 23.

But to return; John the beloved apostle says; "There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear: because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love. We love him because he first loved us." Not because we are afraid of eternal burning in the so-called orthodox hell.

Again: "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar. For he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God, whom he hath not seen?" 1 John iv. 18 20. Read the whole chapter, and you will have a fair illustration of the spirit manifested by our Lord. And Paul positively declares "If any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his." Rom. viii. 9.

But lest I weary your patience, I will close by giving you the following caution. Beware, lest by fostering such a malicious, covetous and wicked spirit as that of the James boys, you be overcome by the same, and find yourself in the condition of a certain class of whom Paul speaks in the tenth of Hebrews, saying; "For if we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour (not eternally scorch or roast) the adversaries. He that despised Moses' law, died without mercy under two or three witnesses; of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite to the Spirit of grace?.... If any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him." Heb. x. 26, 38. And Jesus said; "no man having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God." Luke ix. 62.

Now, in conclusion, let me admonish you, as one desirous of your welfare, to never foster, or ever harbor such an evil spirit as that referred to in the foregoing, lest you be overcome by the same, and so be led into the way of destruction.

But rather cultivate the spirit of Jesus; and you will not need the fears of eternal torments of a burning hell, to restrain you from committing crime. No, my friend, the love of God, and of Jesus, in your heart will be sufficient restraint to keep you from all evil.

Wherefore let us ever pray that the spirit of the Master be our guide, to lead us in all the ways of God. "For his ways are ways of pleasantness; and all his paths are peace." Respectfully your friend.

JOSEPH MESSIMORE.

[illegible] will [illegible] Testament [illegible] ng forth the final destiny [illegible] ly of the impenitent wicked.

First, then, I would refer the reader to the language of John the Baptist. "I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance; but he that comes after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: he shall baptize you with the Holy Spirit and with fire." Matt. iii. 11. Explanation. "Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat (the righteous) into his garner, but he will burn up (not eternally scorch, or roast) the chaff (the wicked) with unquenchable fire." verse 12.

After the fire consumes what it preys upon, it will go out of its own accord, although unquenchable while consuming the combustibles upon which it preys.

2. "Enter ye in at the strait gate, for wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction; and many go in there at: because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life; and few there be that find it." Matt. vii. 13, 14.

The reader will please notice that the contest here is between destruction and life; not between eternal torment and happiness. Hence, they that travel on the broad road will meet with destruction; while they on the narrow way will have life. Eternal life, the opposite of which is eternal death—destruction.

3. Explanation of the parable of the wheat and the tares. "He answered and said unto them, he that soweth the good seed is the Son of man; the field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; the tares are the children of the wicked one.... As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire, so shall it be in the end of this world. The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; and shall cast them into a furnace of fire; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth." Matt. xiii. 37, 42.

How long this state will continue we are not informed. It will be sufficient to say that it will end with the completion of their destruction. Otherwise there could be no sense in the comparison; for as the tares are gathered and cast into the fire to be burned, even so shall it be done to the impenitent wicked.

4. "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal." Matt. xxv. 46.

It is claimed by some that this text implies everlasting pain or torment. But let us look at it in the light of common-sense for a few moments. While the punishment may be eternal in its effects, its infliction may be of short duration. For here, as in the foregoing paragraph, the Savior is contrasting the final destinies of two opposite classes. And as there two classes are opposite, even so must their destinies be opposite. And as the award of the righteous will be eternal life, its opposite—eternal death, must be the award of the impenitent wicked—everlasting destruction.

And this will introduce to our notice another text, viz.

5. 2 Thess. i. 8, 9. "Seeing it is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you,....when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed....in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ: who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power." Again. "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. vi. 23.

Once more. "When lust hath conceived it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is completed, bringeth forth death." James i. 15. By joining these last three texts with Matt. xxv. 46, it will at once appear that it may, without doing violence to the text, be rendered as follows. "These shall go away into everlasting destruction—everlasting death; but the righteous into life eternal."

6. And lastly; The wicked shall come to an end. "For the time is come that judgment [illegible] house of [illegible] us, what [illegible] obey not the gospel of [illegible] Pet. iii. 17.

This is a very important question: which, let the Scripture answer. "For often I told you, and now even weeping I say, many walk as the enemies of the cross of the Anointed one." Phil. iii. 19. Diaglott. Now, from the foregoing it is evident that the wicked, instead of eternal existence in pain and torment, will utterly perish in destruction. Come to an end. Cease to exist as conscious beings. Wherefore I pray that both the writer and reader may so live, as to have a part in the first resurrection, that we may not come under the power of the second death.

JOSEPH MESSIMORE.

We tabulate no news items for the present issue. Strikes are the order of the day. Of this our readers will be fully informed before our paper could reach them. In Chicago we saw great numbers of the unemployed from their own suicidal choice. The insane course taken is not the way to alleviate the wrongs of the wage-workers. The dear school of experience may teach some important lessons to the reckless, though, in many instances, wronged laborer, that might be better learned elsewhere.

VISIT TO CHICAGO.

By invitation of the brethren the Editor spent last Sunday with the church in Chicago, addressing the associated band of believers, and others who were present, at the place of meeting—523 West Madison Street. Though unable to do more in a single discourse on the advertised subject—"The Peculiarities of this Dispensation and Calling of the Church"—than to present a general outline summary of its more prominent features, with very few detailed explanations and illustrations, the audience gave a respectful and attentive hearing to a discourse that might better perhaps, have been defined as—"A Disconnected Dissertation on the Dispensations." There was one point that we wished to particularly impress, which was—that we are not only called out by the gospel from the world, as an ekklesia, a [illegible] Christ Jesus—in order [illegible] and all, [illegible] that this dispensation of the grace of God holds forth a prize of special exaltation to an elected number who, by a well-ordered life and godly conversation, shall prove themselves worthy of that crown of righteousness which is the award promised to the overcoming victors in the high, holy, and heavenly calling. After concluding our remarks, and after a brief intermission, it was our blessed privilege to commemorate together the death of our loved and adorable Redeemer by gathering around a table spread with the sacred emblems of his body and blood. It was particularly cheering to note the goodly number gathered at this memorial institution, who had been drawn together by the sweetly attractive influences of the gospel to thus obey the Savior, who said: "This do in remembrance of me." At 4 p. m., we met at the Disciples place of worship, in another part of the city, where Bro. Button immersed an obedient believer in the Baptistary connected with the church edifice. It was with pleasure that we met Bro. A. W. Button and Bro. Joel A. Simonds and wife, Bro. C. H. Jones, and Bro. T. Wilson at his business place. And it was with no less pleasure that we formed an acquaintance with numbers of our Heavenly Father's children with whom we there met for the first time; and should it prove the last and only one in this world "our hope and crown of rejoicing" is to meet them beyond the deserts of this pilgrimage life, and beyond the cold tides of the river of death, in the Heavenly Jerusalem and Paradise restored. With Br'n. A. Turney and Wm. Wilson and kind families we made our stay while on our transient visit to this great city of the west. Amid the sorrowings of human life there are some gladdening experiences, and we shall look back upon our visit to Chicago as a bright sunny spot in our life-pathway.

Brother H. V. Reed, who statedly preaches for the brethren, was absent from home. His ministrations are most highly and deservedly appreciated—especially as his labor is "a labor of love." It was our intention to call on Prof. Gardner and on J. D. Brown at the office of the Bible Banner, but limited time and some matters of business rendered it out of the question. Of life's brevity and man's mortality we were forcibly reminded when we entered the cars to return home. Among the articles and trunks to go into the baggage car was a box, and we will know its contents. Within its narrow confines we needed no one to tell us was one in the death sleep! How far outreaching and chilly are the shadows that stretch out in sombre gloom across our ever shortening pathway to the house prepared for all living, coming as they do from that land of darkness as darkness itself. How thickly the warning mementos stand along our way to the grave like the solemn statuary along the roads to ancient cemeteries. As says the poet:

> "Deaths stand like Mercuries in every way
> And kindly point us to our journey's end."

Even while in Chicago we had ample demonstration that man at his best estate is vanity. With Brother Wilson we went to Cottage Grove where 'neath the granite base and mounting shaft sleeps Stephen A. Douglass, a statesman who once got upwards of 1,300,000 votes for the highest office in the gift of the American people. The soughing waves of Lake Michigan now murmur the requiem of one who was once an adored idol of multitudinous popular applause. So passes the world away. Death arrests the aged and places the white hairs on the pillow of clay, and the cradle rocks the infant "toward the neighboring tomb." The pale hand lifts the crown from royal temples, and the mitre from priestly brows, and from palace as well as from hovel the inmates are borne to the "long home," and "dust to dust" is the last sad echo from living lips. Over fallen greatness the skillful hand raises granite and marble magnificence, while over the pauper's sunken grave the wild rose planted by the Divine Father breathes its morning incense and evening perfume. O that we may all press forward for that crown of eternal life that gleams in stainless brightness in our Savior's hands.

On Monday we returned home, making our journey both to and from Chicago over one of the best of all lines of travel—the Pittsburgh, Ft. Wayne & Chicago Railway. Having been over the lines of the Pennsylvania Company from New York to Chicago we can speak in the highest praise of these lines and their official management. And today, Tuesday, May 4th, finds us pencilling these paragraphs for our loved paper and its readers. May it be ours to meet in the bright and beautiful Beulah Land beyond the toils, sufferings and [illegible] of life, and [illegible]

SOME NEWSPAPER NOTES.

Editors' and Compositors' Trials.

WE KNOW HOW IT IS.

We presume there is no class of individuals that obtain so much advice as to just how it should be done as an editor. People seem to forget that in publishing, the editor has to use his best judgment as to what will prove of the most good to the greatest number. If we followed the advice of every one our paper would end in being in about the same condition as Mark Twain's cherry tree, which he determined to trim exactly in accordance with the views of his neighbors. He secured the advice of several and then trimmed the tree. One said: "Trim out the centre." Another said: "Cut off the lower limbs," and others gave good advice as to other ways of doing it right. He trimmed his tree, and when it was done he had only a stump that was good for nothing but a hitching post, and was an eyesore to all. The following from the Living Church perhaps gives some indication of the diversity of tastes in the newspaper mind.

"It is amusing to read the letters of advice and suggestion that come to the editor. One man wants a paper in which there are no advertisements. He does not offer to pay the cost of throwing them out, nor even to guarantee that each subscriber shall double his subscription. Another wants a paper principally made up of learned articles; it would be severely ecclesiastical. One thinks that the church paper exists solely for church news; he can get theology from books, and wisdom in pastoral work from his inner consciousness. A lady asks for more stories and entertaining articles; she gets enough preaching in church. A teacher wants more practical papers on Sunday-school work, and considers the space given to the discussion of other things entirely thrown away. These suggestions are kindly expressed and kindly meant, and are received in the same spirit. We are trying to meet all real wants, and it is for this reason that we do not intentionally exclude any. We do not devote any issue to any one class of readers, but we endeavor to secure to all something interesting in every issue."—Our Host.

THE BISHOP'S COPY.

Careless penman know little or reck little of the loss of time and temper consequent on the obscurity of their hieroglyphics. I hold that, as a rule, there is a beam in the eye of the author for every mote that he detects in the eye of the printer. Such expressions as "printers' errors" and "errors of the press" are often very unfair. The author himself is most frequently the primary cause of the errors which provoke so much annoyance. They are the Nemesis of the injury he inflicts by his bad hand-writing on the humble "men of letters." Surely authors have only themselves to blame when the interpretation of their handwriting is rendered a matter of speculation rather than a plain matter of fact. When the copy is a smudgy mass of dark hints and subtle suggestions as to what the author wants to have printed, errors occur of necessity; but why blame the printer? According to my experience it is a wonder that "errors of the press" are not more frequent and flagrant than they actually are. Generally speaking, authors are almost as careless with their proofs as they are with their copy, but they seem remarkably dexterous in detecting, after publication, errors which they had ample opportunity to correct in the proof sheets. How vile some copy is may be dimly understood upon just consideration of the following mild illustration:

A living Bishop writes such an atrocious scrawl as passes description. Upon one occasion a compositor groped his way through his copy until he came to a phrase which baffled his understanding and staggered his imagination. He was fain to pray in aid: "Egaplain this, anon and angola!" After a long conference some one was seized with an inspiration: "Perhaps it's Greek." So the passage was set up in such Greek characters as desperation suggested. There issued a fine confusion of letters; Greek met Greek in fierce antagonism. "Only think of the philological acumen which would have been employed on that" "Greek" passage! or imagine its blood-curdling effect on the Bishop, if the printer's reader had not discovered—by some Owen-like exhibition of inferential sagacity—that the words were, after all, very commonplace English! After [illegible] this the "reader" was not [illegible] old like a [illegible] that a little [illegible] matter I can vouch for—[illegible] the story. Compositors [illegible] have reason to dread the Bishop's copy, for it will only yield them sixpence while they ought to be earning eightpence.—Notes and Queries.

WHAT CONSTITUTES AN EDITOR.

Some people estimate the ability of a periodical and the talent of its editor by the quantity of its original matter. It is comparatively an easy task for a frothy writer to string out a column of words upon any and all subjects. His ideas may flow in one weak, washy, everlasting flood, and the command of his language may enable him to string them together like bunches of onions, and yet his paper may be but a meagor and poor concern. Indeed, the mere writing part of editing a paper is but a small portion of the work. The care, the time employed in selecting, is far more important, and the fact of a good editor is better shown by his selections than anything else, and that, we know, is half the battle. But, we have said, an editor ought to be estimated, his labor understood and appreciated, by the general conduct of his paper—its tone, its uniform, consistent course, aims, manliness, its dignity and its propriety. To preserve those as they should be preserved is enough to occupy fully the time and attention of any man. If to this be added the general supervision of the details of publication, which most editors have to encounter, the wonder is how they find time to write at all.—Henry Watterson.

The Book of Jobab, called Job, Son of Zara, Son of Hruguel, Son of Hesau, Son of Isaac, Son of Habraam,  According to the Septuagint.

CHAPTER XIII.

1. Lo these things hath mine eye seen and mine ear heard.

2. And I know whatever ye know well, and am no more wanting in understanding than ye are.

3. No indeed; and moreover I will talk plainly to the Lord and convince in his sight if I choose.

4. But ye are a wrong kind of physicians, and all healers of wrong things.

5. Would that ye might be dumb, and that your wisdom might take leave to withdraw.

6. But do ye listen to the convic[illegible] of my mouth and attend to the judicial reasoning of my lips.

7. Is it true or not that ye are talking in the presence of the Lord, and in his presence do ye utter deceit?

8. Or may ye dissemble? Do ye yourselves be your own judges.

9. It would be a good thing indeed if he were to track you out. If forsooth ye be the creators of all things, no doubt ye may have added something to him.

10. Nothing less will convince you, and if he hide his face will ye wonder.

11. Whether or not his terror will make you writhe? But fear from him shall fall upon you, and your boasting will depart and your clay body like ashes.

13. Be dumb that I may talk, and that I may pause from anger.

14. While I take up my flesh in my teeth and my life in my hand.

15. If the Mighty One is going to take me in hand (since indeed he has begun to) surely I may talk and convince in his sight.

16. And this may go forth for me unto salvation. For deceit may not enter into his presence.

17. Hear ye, hear ye my spoken (prophetic) words. For I will tell you if you listen.

18. Lo, I am nigh unto my verdict. I know that I am going to be justified.

19. For who is the one that is going to judge me, that now I may be dumb and leave off?

20. Will ye two try my utility? Then from thy face will I not hide.

21. Take away thine hand from off me, and let not fear of thee confound me.

22. Then shalt thou call and I will hearken; then shalt talk and I will make answer.

23. Of what sort are my sins and my transgressions? Teach me what they are.

24. Why dost thou hide away from me? Guide me into thy presence.

25. Like a leaf as it were shaken by the wind wilt thou command respect or like stubble borne away by the wind dost thou set thyself against me?

26. For thou hast written down against me calamity; thou hast encompassed me with the sins of my youth.

27. Thou hast set my feet in hindrance and all my doings hast thou watched; even to the soles of my feet [illegible]

The City Waif.

Rags are his food and torn his clothes;
When asked his name he scarcely knows.
Down the alley they nabd "Jess 'Jim"
Small were the odds to him.

He had a home on an upper floor,
Alone with his mother—now he's more.
In the early dawn she passed away,
Leaving her orphan boy that day.

Poor motherless child! who now will care
Whither he goes or what his fare?
The busy world regards him not,
Though hunger and want may be his lot.

Curled up at night in a box of straw,
When the air is chill and the winds are raw,
He sometimes sleeps—'tis the wanderer's bed.
Where such as he may lay the head.

Lend a helping hand to the little waif.
Kind words may gladden a cheerless life!
And thou may'st see beyond the skies
It was thy Lord, true in disguise.

Then in that blessed world of light,
Where all is pure and all is bright,
His words thy perfect joy shall be,
"In doing this 'twas done to me."

Where There's a Will There's a Way.

This is a very old proverb and a very true one. Sometimes we forget it, though, and say "I can't" before we really have tried at all. Some years ago a few people made up their minds to try to get hold of all the chimney-sweeps in Dublin and give them an education. One day a little fellow came who was asked if he knew his letters.

"Oh, yes, he answered."

"Can you spell?"

"Oh, yes."

"Can you read?"

"Oh, yes."

"What books did you learn from?"

"Please, sir, I never had a book."

"Then who was your schoolmaster?"

"I never went to school at all."

The gentlemen stared, for it seemed very strange that a boy should be able to read and spell and yet never have had a master.

"Then, how did you ever learn?" he asked.

The little boy smiled, and linked his arm in that of a sweep somewhat older than himself:

'Please, sir, Jim taught me the letters over the shop doors as we went to our work, and now I know all the words by heart; and if you'd kindly let us have some books to read, and teach us to do sums and writing we'd be very thankful."

Can't you fancy what good pupils those two boys became, and how they delighted in reading in books instead of making their necks ache by peering [illegible] the shops?

Dear Children.

The tabernacle in the wilderness of which I wrote in my last, had three compartments, named. The Holiest of all, the Holy place, and the outer court. The latter had no covering, but was enclosed by curtains. There was but one way of entrance, which was called the gate of the court, this looked toward the east, or sun rising. When any one entered this straight gate, he then had commenced to walk in the way of Jehovah, turning his back on the natural light, and seeking with his face Zion-ward for the light of the glory of God, which shined forth in the Holiest of all, hid in the distance. In the outer court, was a brazen layer, or large basin filled with water, this was highly polished, resembling a bright looking-glass. Its position was near the door of the tabernacle which led into the Holy place. The door was a very sacred spot for there the cloudy pillar descended, and Jehovah talked with the Lawgiver who said, I pray thee, show me now thy way. Then the Lord commanded him to bring the High Priest, 'who was thirty years old' to the door of the tabernacle. There he was to wash him in the brazen layer, taking off his common clothes, and putting on him beautiful garments, richly ornamented with precious brilliant stones set in the finest gold. After he was thus clothed, the lawgiver was commanded to anoint him with holy oil, which was Jehovah's testimony, or seal that he was a chosen one, set apart for the work of the sanctuary. The High Priest's sons were also washed and anointed with holy oil, but the robe the Lawgiver put on them was fine white linen. This was our heavenly Father's way of showing his wise hearted children the path which leads to life. In all this we have a grand figure of the true, or that representing spiritual or heavenly things.

Now let me unfold to you how Jesus our great High Priest walked in the way his heavenly Father had revealed in the tabernacle. The High Priest and his sons represented Jesus and his brethren, and the washing was a figure of baptism. When he was thirty years old he came to John to be baptised in the Jordan or "that resists judgment." When Jesus came up out of the water the Holy Spirit, or anointing power like a dove rested upon him, and a voice from heaven gave an everlasting testimony, saying, "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased." My chosen one whom I have made quick of understanding, that he may teach those who will enter in at the straight gate, Jehovah's way of life, more perfectly, for the law was only a shadow of good things to come, it instructed them how to come to Jehovah, therefore Jesus said he was filling up the righteousness of the law in being immersed in water. He knew it was his heavenly Father's way, and in doing this he said "not my will, but thine be done."

The High Priest under the law knew it would be instant death to him to dare to presume to minister in holy things unless he had obeyed in every minute particular the command given by God. How very important it is for us to search diligently for the way of the Lord, for we can never find the path of life, unless we follow our Lord Jesus Christ, he is our example, and if we walk in his footsteps, then we are clothed as the sons of the High Priest, in the spotless white robe of Christ's righteousness, and becoming his brethren, we belong to the Royal priesthood. I will leave you a little longer in the outer court, for there is something connected with it I have not yet explained. Trusting you will read carefully these lessons of instruction, and strive to enter in at the straight gate.

Your affectionate Teacher.

E. COFFMAN.

St. Cloud, Minn., April 15.

This city has been visited with a calamity, the ghastly details of which have never been equalled since the harvest of death at New Ulm.

Few persons in this part of the country probably know about the destruction of New Ulm. I clip the following from a Christian periodical of April, 1884.

C. BOARDMAN.

The town of New Ulm is, or was, situated on the Minnesota river, in Minnesota, 16 miles above the city of Mankato. It was settled mostly by a colony of German Neologists, or infidels, and contained about 1500 inhabitants. From the beginning of its history, the inhabitants have been most bitter and determined enemies of everything that bore the name of Christianity. They carried their hostility so far that they would never permit a professed preacher of the gospel to come among them, or preach a sermon in the town. About two weeks before the late horrid Indian massacre, their blasphemy and wickedness culminated. Their cup of wickedness was filled, and God's mercy exhausted. These wretches made an effigy of Jesus Christ—bore it through the streets on a rail, amid the jeers and hootings of the rabble, and finally burnt it at the stake!

The long-suffering of God was exhausted—the instruments of his vengeance were prepared, and the blow fell. Sudden and unexpected as the day of doom, the red men of the forests were upon them. Five hundred of them were slain on the spot—the rest fled in terror—the entire town was reduced to ashes, and for a space of 8 miles in the country round, the inhabitants were massacred, and their dwellings burned.

Such was the fate of this modern Sodom, "where also our Lord was crucified." May its dreadful fate be a warning to all scoffing infidels of the world, and let them know that a more awful doom awaits them at the appearing of the great God, and our Savior Jesus Christ.—J. F. Willcox, in Harbinger.

East Plum River, Ill.

Dear Brethren:

It is with sadness of heart that I take my pen once more to greet you especially, all those of my personal acquaintances in the flesh residing on the Pacific coast. I have had many trials since returning from there, but the last appears the hardest to bear. My third son, aged nearly 16 years, has fallen asleep in Jesus the anointed on March 28, 1886, after an illness of a year, of consumption. He was immersed this last winter in the name of the Anointed One. Oh, how my heart aches to know how he suffered the last three months. He bore his pain in a spirit of meekness hardly to be expected of one of his age. He had naturally a very intuitive mind and was instructed in the things of the kingdom and the name of the Anointed. Pray with me brethren that the kingdom may soon come, then death and trial will end with the elect.

Our dear Brother Whitesitt has been laboring here for us this winter and quite a number have embraced the truth. This place was among the first localities where the truth took effect, but sad to contemplate the condition of the church in this age. Most all appear to awaken from a natural sleep when some good brother comes along and holds a meeting or two, and as soon as the meeting is over the church relapse back to slumber. Truly we are in the last times; when we compare the state of the body to the Scriptures it is one of the most prominent signs of the near approach of the Master. It is high time we awake out of sleep and have oil in our lamps and burning bright. Dear brethren and sisters lift up your heads and rejoice, for soon we will be delivered from this body of corruption into the glorious liberty of the sons of God.

ON OUR BOOK SHELVES.

Brother Wiley Jones' work "The Gospel of the Kingdom." Leather binding, former price $1.50; now 75c. Cloth gilt, former price, $1.50; now 75c. Cloth binding, former price $1.00; now 50c. Paper cover, former price, 50c.; now 25c. Friends, you who are at work in the Master's vineyard, think of this chance offered you from week to week to get the book that gives the foundation of our hope in the clearest manner possible, for so little money. It is not right for these books to remain long on our shelves. There is work for them all over the land. "Key Words" is another work by the same author, former price 25c.; now 13c.; and "Thanatopsis," former price 10c.; now 5c.

Have you any smart infidels in your neighborhood? Do they sneer at and ridicule your views of the Bible? If you have we have a little work here that will aid you in routing them completely, and if you have none near you now you can scarcely stir many miles without meeting one, and if you are posted in their theories you have already won half of the battle. Sister Reed's little book, "Creation vs. Evolution" is the work we refer to, and all should possess a copy. Price 25c.

Our lamented Brother Bingrader's "Reply to Ingersoll" is another book that should be more largely circulated. It is just what its name indicates—a Reply to Mr. Ingersoll—a reply that Mr. Ingersoll or any other infidel will not even try to answer, so it stands, for its foundation is laid in God's holy word. Price 50c.

The Gift of Life Eternal through Jesus Christ is the great subject for us. Eternal Life a Free Gift. Brother J. H. Pettengill has written a book on this subject, and all who read it say the work is well done. We can send you a copy for $1.00.

We write and talk much of the Kingdom and its Restoration. Brother Silas Hons has written a book on this subject that will aid us very much in our study of the Kingdom and the wonders of the Restoration. One dollar will place it on your table.

There have been different ages and dispensations in the past—we live now—there is an Age to Come, and Bro. Weethee has told us in his work on this subject, the result of his life-time's search as to the nature and the proximity of the age coming hereafter. This is a large book of over 600 pages. Price $3.00.

Space will not admit of mention of half what our shelves contain. The Emphatic Diaglott, by B. Wilson; Atheism and Theism, by J. G. Wilson; Bible Triumphant, by Mrs. H. V. Reed; Christ's Kingdom, Where is it and What is it? by Jos. Lucas; A Translation of Matthew's Gospel, by Chas. Gardner; that grand work, A Letter to a Friend, by Mrs. Woodruff; Which is Right? or Is Christ's Throne in Heaven or on the Earth? by Thos. Wilson; Whom Shall These Things Be? by H. Bowman; A Letter to a Baptist Minister, by Daniel Howard; the Doctrine of Baptism, besides a host of those little silent leaflets that work all the time. When you are resting, being wearied, they keep on. Who will help circulate these books? They are all good. There may be an isolated expression that some might object to, but the teaching in the main is endorsed by all our best writers and thinkers. We are ready to fill your orders. See advertisements in other parts of this paper.

MY THEOLOGY AND MY COMFORT.

He holds the key of all unknown,
And I am glad.
If other hands should hold the key,
Or if he trusted it to me,
I might be sad.

What if to-morrow's curse were here
Without its rest?
I had rather be unlock the day,
And, as the hours swing open, say,
"My will is best."

The very dimness of my sight
Makes me secure;
For, groping in my misty way,
I feel his hand—I hear him say:
"My help is sure."

I cannot read his future plan,
But this I know:
I have the smilings of his face,
And all the refuge of his grace
While here below.

Enough; this covers all my want,
And so I rest;
For what I cannot, he can see,
And in his care I sure shall be Forever blest.

PROPHETIC PROBLEMS IN THE LIGHT OF HISTORY.

Profane history is Prophetic History fulfilled. All the history of events predicted to transpire, beyond the Bible chronology (A. D. 96), must be solved by the light of Profane history. To know what prophetic problems are wanting of solution, we should be familiar with the world's past history. At present it will not be required to review the inspired histories of the four great empires of Dan. ii. 31, 44; and Dan. vii., nor of the 4th kingdom of John, in his Apocalyptic visions. It is very generally conceded that those chains of prophecy are meting out their last links. Messiah's return and reign are in the very near future. The signs of his approach cannot fail to interest every student of prophecy. It is a sin of equal magnitude to fail to discern the signs of his second coming as it was to overlook those of his first advent.

In the events of the true Eastern Question (which we have fully investigated in our forth-coming work), are involved the return of the Jews, the return of Messiah, the overthrow of the nations, and his endless reign.

What bearing have the great national movements of the present hour on the solution of these great events? What have they to do with the return and nationalization of the Hebrews; and with the reign of their Messiah, and with the subjugation of the nations? It is their prophetic aspect that gives them special interest.

Gog (the Russian Bear) is making every effort to reach the "mountains of Israel;" either by way of Constantinople and Anatolia, or through Central Asia, India, Persia and Syria. By way of Asia Minor, is the route more direct and desirable since it involves the fall of the Crescent before the Cross.

Can Russia succeed in her efforts against Constantinople? What powers would meet her before the walls of that great city? Let us glance at the late developments of southeastern Europe.

1. What nationalities are in motion? 2. What are their aims and purposes? 3. What are the designs of Jehovah in pushing forward these movements. The lesser kingdoms, are Servia, Bulgaria and Greece; the greater powers, are Austria, Turkey, England and Russia. The other nations of western Europe have as yet occupied rather an interested but subordinate rank. They speak but do not act, only in the national conferences. France and Germany are too closely occupied with the results of their recent deadly conflicts to take any very decided stand on either side of the coming struggle. The chief actors are Turkey, Greece, Servia Bulgaria, Austria, Russia and England.

It may be asked, What have Austria, England and Russia, to do with the disputes and family feuds of the Ottoman empire? Why not allow the Sultan to settle his own difficulties? Simply for this reason, the Sultan is one of the world's great officers, the Custodian of the gate (Constantinople) of the middle high-way to the Orient. No other nation can hold the gate without arousing a general war. The Sultan, "sick" as he is represented, holds in his hand the Key of Gentile domination. He may be robbed of provinces, yet his imperial destiny is as firm, for the present, as Jehovah's immutable purpose. The jealousies of the other powers, fix the tenure of his office as stable as the everlasting hills. Such he must continue to be till the British Empire, the Hebrew friend, becomes sufficiently powerful in Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and Syria, to establish and defend Hebrew nationality, in the land of Israel, against its most potent enemies.

Next in the mission of the British Empire, (Dan. xii. 1, 2). Till that work is accomplished, the Anglo-Saxon power (10 tribes), will hold in check the powers of the Gentile world. "The heathen (Gentiles) may rage, and the people imagine a vain thing. The kings of the earth (may) set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together (as at Berlin and Constantinople), yet he that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh; the Lord shall have them in derision." "God shall speak unto them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure."

The nations have in view an increase of national greatness. Jehovah aims to honor his people, and their Messiah his well-beloved, and only begotten Son.

Whether the present movements will result in a general war or not, that event looms up in the near future. The British Empire is the protectorate of the Sultan's dominions, and as such its fleet will command the waters that surround the Turkish capital and empire.

What can Austria, Servia, Bulgaria, or even Russia accomplish against the Sultan and his powerful protector? We think that we utter the inspired sentiments of the ancient Seers, when we say that Russia was never designed to fill the office of Custodian of the middle high-way to the East. Our reasons have been stated in previous articles:—The Russian Empire is the Gog of Ezekiel, who was the successor of the Assyrian, the ancient enemy of God's people, and as such he is described by Ezekiel. Should Russia take Constantinople, the Ottoman territory would fall into his hands and the Jewish emigration would be at an end. The Ottoman empire, aided by the British Empire with the western powers, must keep Gog in check until the Hebrew monarchy gains territory and power. Much is said of "The sick man," the Turkish empire, and her utter inability to hold her power, in the face of the advancing empire of the North. The question is not, what internal strength has the Ottoman empire to resist the Russian empire, but it is, What power can she command? Dynamite is still the resistless, deadly explosive, though used by one of physical weakness. Turkey's power is measured by the strength of the nations she controls. In her struggle with Russia she has been able to command the great national strength of Western Europe. Russia now stands alone in the settlement of the [illegible] States.

Russia contends that Alexander's domination was to be limited to five years, while Alexander, backed by the Western powers claims an unlimited term of years, over Bulgaria and East Roumelia. Now settle it to five years. Thus a cordon of semi-independent states is being extended from the Black sea, south of the Danube, and westward towards the Adriatic sea. No one, familiar with European policy, can fail to discern the national bearings of such new combinations. It is a rampart to Turkey against the encroachments of the northern despot. Such national combinations are sanctioned by the Latin powers, but resisted by the great Slavonic ruler. Russia will not submit since it cuts off her last hope of the conquest of Constantinople.

Jehovah is evidently the Master Spirit of the nations. The time has come for the final return of his ancient people to the land of promise, to be erected into a mighty kingdom. Gog (Russia the successor of ancient Assyria) opposes God's immutable purpose, and has, for centuries, been attempting to supplant the Ottoman Turk in the middle Eastern Highway through Constantinople. God has most signally defeated all these aspiring attempts, the Most High, who rules the nations at pleasure, has seen fit, in his inscrutable Providence, and wise purposes, to allow the seat of his future kingdom, to remain for centuries, in the hands of the Turks. Knowing that the visible rule would be Ottoman or Russian (his soulless enemy).

To resist, therefore, the southern movements of the Russian autocrat, he has erected a barrier composed of nations, [illegible] extending from China, through Southern Asia and Europe to the Adriatic sea, thus saying to the Northern Bear, Thus far and no further, till my people are returned and erected into a strong nation, and I bring them to judgment on the mountains of Israel.

Such, evidently, is the foreshadowing of God's immutable purposes. This great judgment invasion, headed by Russia, will be a confederacy of the subordinate "Kings of the East," marching from the East, by way of the Euphrates. Since they are on their way to judgment under Divine control, it is fit that God, their visible commander, and Judge, should remove all obstacles to their speedy march westward. At this point it is all well to solve a few subordinate problems. 1. Are we now living under the pouring out of the sixth vial? 2. On what is that vial poured? 3. What is the drying up of the Euphrates? 4. Who are the kings of the East? Whence are these confederate kings marching, and for what purpose? These problems we shall investigate in their order.

I. Are we now living under the pouring out of the sixth vial? Expositors usually answer this question in the affirmative, we are disposed to the same answer for the following reasons. (a) The vials are all judgment vials, and final:—"And I saw another sign in heaven, great and marvellous, seven angels having the seven last plagues; for in them is filled up the wrath of God," Rev. xv. 1. vs. "And the seven angels came out of the temple, having the seven plagues, clothed in pure and white linen, and having their breasts girdled with golden girdles." The "white linen" is a symbol of the saints' purity, Rev. xix. 8, and therefore, identifies these seven angels as resurrected saints, assistant priests, who arose and went up with Christ to assist in his royal High-priesthood in the true temple, vs. 7. "And one of the four beasts (living creatures) gave unto the seven angels seven golden vials full of the wrath of God, who liveth for ever and ever. vi. 8. And the temple was filled with smoke from the glory of God, and from his power; and no man was able to enter into the temple, (Holy of holies) till the seven plagues of the seven angels were fulfilled."

As God's national judgments have been in progress since A. D. 1798, these vials, symbols of God's wrath, are being poured out upon the physical world and through this upon the religious, social, moral and political worlds. For, as the human family in all its varied parts dwell upon the physical world as a home, they are obliged to suffer from its woes. The whole earth testifies to this truth. Through physical agents, God afflicts the human family.

In the last days, nature was to suffer, and the vials were poured upon the earth. Hear the Savior, "And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth (as a necessary result), distress of nations, with perplexity, the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and [illegible] coming on the earth: for the [illegible] heaven shall be shaken." Luke xxi. As these signs immediately precede Christ's return, and as they are now transpiring we are living in the judgment age when nature is receiving the vials of Jehovah's wrath. The first vial empties its contents on the earth, the second on the sea, the third is poured upon the rivers, and fountains; the fourth on the sun, the fifth, not on the beast itself but on the seat of the beast, a physical location.

"The sixth angel poured his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up; that the way (not ways) of the Kings of the east might be prepared." Rev. xvi. 12. It is here specifically declared that the contents of the sixth vial were emptied upon a "great river," and that the great river was the Euphrates; that the result was the drying up of its waters, and that the waters dried up for a specific purpose, viz., that the "way" of the kings of the East might be made ready. Ready for what? Ready for a great return march. Then agents go forth to enlist and drill those kings, and of the whole world, for a march and a battle.

THE KINGDOM.—OUT OF SIGHT, OUT OF MIND.

"The kingdom" occurs with its association of judge, throne, king and kingdom some 300 times in the New Testament, and about 2000 times in the Bible. Its usage is made most determinate and absolute as it applies to "the four" great Gentile, and minor, monarchies.

A distinguished M. E. minister, J. R. Thompson, D. D., preached April 4th, from Matt. v. 17, "Jesus went teaching and preaching the gospel of the kingdom." The sum—the leading doctrine—of this sermon is all that need be given for the purpose of testimony to the nature, location or importance of this kingdom—that Jesus preached—for which we pray; and is the goal of Christian faith and hope. 2 Tim. iv. 1-8.

I. The preacher said truly, in substance, that Christ's preaching differed from the prevailing habits of the present ministry. Jesus did not preach against war (as a subject), nor slavery, nor the wrongs imposed on women, nor other evils, as such, or as we do.

(Note. This kingdom is to come in its revealed order, after the "four" great Gentile powers—Babylon, Greece, Greece and Rome—that fill out "the times of the Gentiles." Ezek. i. 15-23; Luke xxi. 24. Then "The blessed and only potentate and his times" come) and having "put down all (present) rule and power," 1 Cor. xv. 24, he will reign forever, even forever and ever. Dan. vii. 14, 18, 27; Heb. ii, 14; Rev. xx.; xii. 15-21; i. 5. This embraces "the restitution of all things spoken." Acts iii. 21. "The gospel of Christ embraces these hundred-fold glories of the future," and as Jew, with Gentile, was carnal, and resting in the present, the call was to repentance and belief of such "good news" of the future.)

II. Dr. Thompson, I repeat, stated that Christ never preached against war, as a subject, nor the elevation of women, nor on other evils as such. The reason was that Christ believed reform comes from individuals—reform men themselves and you reform society. Their reform was supposed, of course, to cover and supply all that is needful to set these things right, that somehow human conditions may be beautiful.

III. In this there is a show only of partial truth. Christ did not reform even Jerusalem! Nor did the apostles themselves reach their own goal. Peter stumbled sadly; and even Paul, under Christ, the head of the gospel church, had not attained nor was already perfect! Phil. iii. Then the great apostasy; the harlot riding the beast and her daughters after her, constituting mystic Babylon on their way to doom, Rev. xvii.-xx., all which withstand his shallow and presumptuous theory. The grand focus forbid! The world, flesh and devil" remain to forbid the possibility of his being on the New Testament plane of "the gospel of the kingdom." The condition of the Christian world needs power—"the all power of heaven and earth," to "put down all rule and authority, to the last enemy death;" to raise up the dead and inaugurate the "kingdom yet to come."

In justice to Dr. Thompson it is due to add that he did bravely (in his way, however unwittingly) to demonstrate his departure from Christ's teachings and ordinances. In baptism "death, burial and resurrection" appear. In the supper it is "the broken body and shed blood," still flowing (in symbol) till he come! Rom. vi. 3-5; Col. ii. 12; iii. 4; 1 Cor. xi. 26; xv. 11, 55; 1 Thess. [illegible] Phil. iii. 20, 21.

A prominent business man inducted, like this preacher, (regularly, as is this case) on the "kingdom is up and we in it." "But sir, do you not ignore the fact that as far as Paul has attained into it (or it in him) he groaned to get out!" He settled back into silence with "Ugh!"

VI. Brother G. B. Kramer, is "the Church of the Blessed Hope."—who heard this M. E. brother, p. m.—rehearsed it in the sleeping of the same day. He gave the salient ideas and announced in contrast the glowing visions of "Glory to God and goodwill to men" by the coming "King of Glory." True, the new man is renewed in righteousness—is created in Christ Jesus unto good works here; but "the crown and joint heirship" is yet with him in the kingdom to come, with paradise restored and all blessing blessed. Amen. Psa. lxxii.

Our relations to Christ embrace three stages: "without him, in him, enthroned with him!" This takes in nature, grace and glory, amen! Dr. Thompson would leave us midway at best, and that in the tomb "without the promise." Heb. xi. 13-35 and 39; 1 Thess. iv. 13-18.

VII. Do hear! Their earthly-minded misconception of the kingdom in our poor mortality, has no room provided for "the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven!" No, "forever" in our dying and death, no throne or king in Zion, no subject "nations," no "first dominion," nor "paradise with its tree of life," Rev. ii. 7, nothing but a cluster of delusions which no diversity of terms can excuse or conceal.

Its extremity in folly may be expressed by the Shakers' song which I heard with strong voice in full concert, and in sober earnestness (as if to impress their auditor) they sang, "The work that Jesus Christ began, Is finished now by Mother Ann!" It is surely as good for the Shakers as for any other class. But "the Christian calling, the blessed hope, the faith that saves, the abundant entrance and full reward," are thus ignored and Christ dishonored in the house of his friends. 1 Thess. i. 9, 10; Titus ii. 13; Heb. x. 37, 39; 2 Peter i. 1-11; 2 John 8. At its very best it is but an inexcusable evasion of "the gospel of the kingdom," and even that founded in utter mistake of the gospel system. "Jesus died and rose again the third day according to the Scriptures." The servant is not above his Lord.

Brother Kramer had thus a good back ground (as if made to order) for his good picture in glowing colors of "The great King in his kingdom" now about due. Psa. xlv. to xlviii.

The opportunity was well improved, for all our advances in wisdom and knowledge are largely by comparison and contrast. Hence this report, so that the preacher himself may recognize his signal misapprehension and admit that "a reform" that embraces "the broken body, blood shedding and burial, with hope only in the resurrection of the just" would not be "good news to himself nor others, except in the Abrahamic Christian faith of our present mortality contrasted with the glory honor and immortality provided [illegible] coming kingdom and assured [illegible] gospel and record of [illegible] or [illegible] per to [illegible] Subscribers?

J. B. COOK.

P. S. The continuity and vital association of truth comes out clearly in the scale of headship. The head of the woman is the man, the head of the man is Christ and the head of Christ is God! 1 Cor. xi. 3. Now as the head or correlative of the kingdom is the king, in omitting the kingdom we lose the king! Nay, more, "the body, the church," on that line loses its head!

J. B. C.

Dear Brother Davis:

In THE RESTITUTION of April 7th, I notice your communication in reply to my "Open Letter" in issue of Feb. 17th. My inclination would be to review your letter in detail, but I know that our Editor does not approve of prolonged discussions. In justice to myself, however, I must call attention to a grave misrepresentation of my position, in the very outset of your communication.

I tried to state the position very plainly so as to avoid any possible misunderstanding, yet in your article you charge me with upholding what I very positively called in question as untrue, viz., the second or minor proposition of the syllogism, as follows: "To believe in Christ it is necessary to know and understand his teachings, and not believe anything out of harmony with those teachings." In fact my whole communication was an attempt to demonstrate the fallacy of this proposition; and it is incomprehensible to me how you could have so misunderstood me. May I ask of you the favor to give the article a careful reading, and, as I know you to be honest in your desire for truth, if you will try to answer to your own mind the questions therein raised, consistently with your position, I shall be satisfied.

Before laying down my pen I feel constrained to allude to the long list of doctrines of undoubted truth which you class as "First Principles." This term is very elastic, and as there is no divine authority for such classification of truth, it depends entirely upon the caprice of the teacher as to how many or how few doctrines shall be classified as "First Principles." I have never yet found two persons who occupy the general position that you do, who have agreed in their enumeration; and as the question of life or death eternal is in the balance, it becomes a matter of vital interest.

If the long array of doctrines that you mention, covering the purposes of Jehovah towards earth and its inhabitants from the first blow at the supper until the consummation of the ages, are to be termed first principles, I am led to inquire of what do the second principles consist? It is a significant fact that in this human grouping of doctrines you omit three important truths that are grouped in the Word of Inspiration, and in so many words termed the "gospel by which we are saved," viz., "How that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures, and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day." 1 Cor. xv.

Again you speak of this comprehensive knowledge of the divine purposes as constituting the "milk of the word" with which babes in Christ are to be fed. Do you not see an inconsistency in this position? First, it is required that all these things shall be understood and believed before one can become even a babe in Christ; and yet you speak of these "First Principles" as being the milk of the word on which they are to be fed, after already being thoroughly "indoctrinated with them before their birth." There is an obvious lack of harmony in these two propositions.

But I am doing what I promised not to do, and reviewing your article. Of course as you started out in your review of my communication with an entire misconception of my position, your article is in no sense a criticism of the same, and I do not so consider it.

Thanking you for the courteous spirit manifested, and assuring you of my sincere esteem and Christian love, I am Yours for Truth,

SAMUEL WILSON.

"ROCK OF AGES."

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me"—
Thoughtlessly the maiden sang:
Fell the words unconsciously
From her girlish, careless tongue;
Sang as little children sing;
Sang as sing the birds in June;
Fell the words like light leaves down,
On the current of the tune—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Let me hide myself in Thee"—
Felt her soul no need to hide:
Surely the song as song could be—
And she had no thought beside;
All the words unheedingly
Fell from lips untouched by care,
Dreaming not they each might be
On some other lips a prayer—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me"—
Twas a woman sang them now,
Pleadingly and prayerfully;
Every word her heart did know.
Rose the song as storm-tossed bird
Beats with weary wing the air,
Every note with sorrow stirred—
Every syllable a prayer—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me"—
Life grown aged sang the hymn
Trustingly and tenderly—
Voice grown weak and eyes grown dim,
"Let me hide myself in Thee!"
Trembling though the voice and low,
Ran the sweet tune peacefully
Like a river in its flow.
Sang as only they can sing
Who behold the promised rest—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me"
Sung above a coffin lid;
Underneath, all restfully,
All life's joys had sorrowed hid,
Nigher more, O storm-tossed soul,
Never more from wind or tide,
Never more from billow's roll,
Will thou need thyself to hide.
Could the slightest, sunken eyes,
Close beneath the soft gray hair,
Could the mute and stiffened lips
Move again in pleading prayer,
Still, aye, still the words would be
"Let me hide myself in Thee."

THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

In RESTITUTION, of March 10, is an article by Wm. Ellis, in reference to this subject as set forth in my previous papers. It is well that special attention should be called to the proclamation of the gospel as first made by John the Baptist and our Lord himself, as recorded in Matt. iii. 2; and iv. 7—"The kingdom of heaven is at hand." W. E., renders this—"the reign of the heavens hath come." The translation "hath come" is given without the slightest warrant of that the original will admit of such a translation, even contenting himself and his readers with giving some reasons entirely outside the text referred to.

The article admits of a reply in few words, or at considerable length, or even by a middle course. I shall take the liberty of using all these methods.

1. If the reign or kingdom of the heavens had really come at the time when John had made his proclamation—Where was the kingdom before it came?—that is, during some 500 years from the return from Babylon down to the time of John. Again. If the kingdom had come when John and Jesus preached, how is it that some time afterwards, our Lord taught his disciples to pray "THY KINGDOM COME?" Had the kingdom departed in the interval? or is the kingdom of the heavens one thing, and the kingdom of God another? W. E., speaks of facts bearing on the question, but apart from verbal criticism on the rendering "hath come," can this rendering be maintained in the presence of such a simple fact as our Lord teaching the prayer, "Thy Kingdom Come?" "What a man seeth why doth he yet (or pray) for?"

2. Amplifying this brief reply, and still leaving verbal criticism aside so far as "hath come" is concerned, I might refer to W. E's, contention that the existence of the land, the presence of the tribes of Judah, Benjamin and Levi, the priesthood, and the law of Moses, administered by the priests as provincial rulers under the power of Rome, constituted these rulers in possession of the kingdom. Besides there was the sender of the message, Jehovah; next the messenger, the Lord Jesus Christ. Next, the Divine power exercised by the messenger in the working of miracles; his claiming "all power in heaven and in earth." Then there was the absolute Sovereignty of God.

Now the simple fact is that the first four of these elements of the kingdom of God had been in existence, and more or less in actual operation from the time of the return from Babylon; and were therefore not peculiar to the time of John and Jesus' proclamation. The Romans also had been in possession for about a hundred years, and permitted the Jews, under certain important limitations, to administer and enforce their own laws, just as they were doing in the days of Jesus. "The absolute sovereignty of God," also, had never for one moment been in abeyance, and was not by any means peculiar to that time. The only element which could claim any peculiarity was the exercise of the Divine power in the miracles of our Lord.

In regard to this element, W. E., quotes the word of Jesus—"If I by the finger of God cast out demons, no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you." But all that our Lord claims for this power is that it was a sign to the Jews that the kingdom of God had come upon them as eyewitnesses of powers, which are otherwise described as "the powers of the world to come;" in other words that the kingdom was "at hand." The word epi used here and rendered "upon" which is its usual equivalent, is, with the accusative as here, sometimes rendered "toward" as in Matt. xii. 40; Rom. xi. 22; Eph. ii. 7; Heb. vi. 1. The idea expressed in such passages is simply equivalent to near or "at hand." Indeed the word "upon" or "on" is used even in English in the sense of "near." Thus, "London on the Thames." "Weston-super-mare." This is evidently derived from some ancient usage, as we have in the Greek "epi to potamo"—literally upon the river, but really near the river, that is at the river's side. We have also in the Revelation, "the harlot, sitting upon many waters," that is by or near many waters.

W. E., to sustain his theory ignores the radical sense of the term kingdom, which is the dom of a King, that is the dominion exercised by a King. Where was the exercise of Jehovah's dominion as the true King of Israel at the time when John and Jesus preached. He was truly their rightful King, but in the exercise of his Divine Sovereignty he suffered the authority of his kingdom to be usurped by Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, Greeks, and latterly by the Romans who made tools of the chief priests of the Jews, in order to the ultimate carrying out of his own purposes.

Taking a case for illustration, though not in all respects in point, yet clear enough for the point in question,—Charles Stewart, Son of Charles I., of England, was abroad at the time his father was executed, and was the rightful heir to the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. During eleven years from A. D. 1649 to A. D. 1660, his kingdom had no existence. His kingdom, under the name of a Commonwealth, was a Republic. Yet the land existed, the people existed, the [illegible] even priests; but with [illegible] that all this constituted the kingdom of Charles II. And no doubt the time came when it might have been proclaimed that his kingdom was "at hand;" although it is just as clear that this proclamation might have been made, and yet in its actual coming might have been postponed for a longer or shorter period.

3. But our more lengthened reply is yet before us, and it now becomes my duty to examine the terms of the proclamation of John and our Lord—"The kingdom of heaven is at hand." W. E. to suit his ideas derived from other reasonings, gives a rendering which is neither warranted by his reasonings, nor the term used in the original Greek; neither is it countenanced by any translation that has come under my notice. As I have mentioned, he adduces no proof that the language of the preachers who used the terms will bear his rendering. He rests his whole theory on his reasonings; whereas if his rendering of the terms of the proclamation was correct, it would be perfectly sufficient by itself to settle the question, and I for one should not have a word to say.

Besides, comment on this proclamation has a history, which of itself would well warrant some discussion, which I trust may appear in what I have further to say.

Meanwhile, I have to remark that while W. E., renders the proclamation "The reign of the heavens hath come," he renders a parallel passage in Matt. i. 15, "The reign of God hath come near." In the original the term in all three passages, (Matt. iii. 2; iv. 17; Mark i. 15;) is identically the same, and in the same tense, namely "eggiken," the perfect of eggizo. Overlooking the looseness shown by W. E., in rendering the same term in senses so opposite in meaning, it would seem that W. E., assumes that for practical purposes these opposite renderings are substantially identical in signification. I demur to this in toto. There is an immense gulf between "hath come," and "is at hand," or "hath come near." This truth has even found embodiment in the proverb—"There is many a slip between the cup and the lip." To be outside the house and inside the house are not more different than being "at hand," and "having come." The foolish virgins outside the closed door, and the wise virgins inside the house, form an apt illustration. The elder brother of the prodigal son "drew nigh to the house" and "heard music and dancing." On knowing the cause—"Thy brother is come"—"he was angry and would not go in."

To show more distinctly that there is a broad distinction between being "at hand" and "having come," it may be well to point out how the terms are used in the Scriptures. I quote a verse from Ezekiel (xxxvi. 8) which is conclusive on this point—

"But ye, O mountains of Israel, ye shall shoot forth your branches, and yield your fruit to my people of Israel; for they are AT HAND TO COME."

Observe here that verse 10, as well as the whole chapter, shows that "my people of Israel" signifies" all the house of Israel, and not merely Judah and Benjamin then in captivity in Babylon. This prophesy therefore has reference to the final restoration. The phrase "at hand" has therefore an application perfectly compatible with a lapse of time over 2000 years.

This is, moreover, in exact accordance with other modes of expressing the Divine conception of time in relation to the fulfilment of promises which appear to us to be long delayed. Take one example from Isaiah—(liv. 7, 8.)

"FOR A SMALL MOMENT have I forsaken thee; But with great mercies will I gather thee.

IN A LITTLE WRATH I hid my face from thee A MOMENT; But with EVERLASTING kindness will I have mercy in thee, Saith the Lord thy Redeemer."

In such a passage as this it is the "everlasting" duration of the "kindness" which causes, by the comparison, thousands of years to dwindle into "a moment," even "a small moment." And it is only our failure to apprehend this, arising from our sheer inability to measure the infinite, that we create difficulties in our understanding the ways of God.

Again, to show how there may nearness and yet a lengthened lapse of time take place before the accomplishment of an event, I quote Paul's words to the Romans:—xiii. 11, 12.

"And that, knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put [illegible]

[illegible] tion" nor "the day." Although both will certainly [illegible] due time, both are still impending. The "salvation" is "nearer" still, and "the day" is still "at hand." And I may mention that the term rendered "at hand" in verse 12 is exactly the same, and same tense, as in the three passages in Matthew and Mark, namely the perfect tense of eggizo.

Coming a little closer to the terms of the proclamation, I find that the first meaning given in Liddell and Scott's Greek Lexicon of the term eggizo is "to bring near." It is derived from the adjective eggus, near, and must be rendered by any terms which express nearness, but not actually come.

As I have mentioned, all the English Versions that I have seen give substantially the same rendering—the phrase "at hand" being the most common, which is the rendering of the Revised. Marginal—gives "approacheth;" Newcome "draweth near." Approach is from ad to and proximus near and simply signifies to come near.

Then translations into other languages are equally unanimous in giving the same idea of nearness. I find the following in an article in the Herald of the Kingdom, Vol. vi. Feb. 1856.—"The Italian has e vicino, near. The Spanish, se ha acercado, has acceded. The French, est proche, and the German, ist nahe herbey gekommen, is near by here to come." I may mention also that the Latin appropinquavit from prope near; and that even the Scotch Gaelic has a phrase of similar import, amfogue. I find that the same terms are used in the Latin and Gaelic versions of Rom. xiii. 11, 12, as are used in Matt. iii. 2, etc., a further combination of the truth that the "salvation" and "the day" there spoken of, though still future, were in the first century, spoken of as near.

A most important confirmation of these unanimous testimonies is found in the Hebrew version of the New Testament, made [illegible] use for the benefit of the Jews. The term which represents eggike is KARB, and is identical with [illegible] used in Ezek. xxxvi. 8, already referred to, where it is rendered "at hand," followed by LABI'A rendered "to come." The term KARB is that used in the Hebrew version in Rom. xiii. 11, 12, already treated of in reference to "our salvation," being nearer than when we believed, and the day being "at hand."

Over and above the ordinary opinions of the popular commentators on this subject of the kingdom of heaven being in brief, "the gospel dispensation," it may be well to trace the views of modern reformers regarding it. The late Mr. Alex Campbell of Bethany, Virginia, made this proclamation of John and our Lord, a fundamental element of the Christian Institution, as he termed the order of things introduced by the Apostles acting under the authority of their Master. The earliest reference I can most readily find at present is a statement in a letter addressed by Mr. John Black of London, England, in July 1843, to Dr. John Thomas. Mr. Black was a leading man in the Reformation church. He said,....."you are also much concerned about "the kingdom" which you say is not yet set up. You will agree, the prophets foretold the setting up of a kingdom, especially Daniel; John the Baptist preached it was at hand; Jesus, his Apostles in his time, and the seventy, all testified it to be "at hand;" and Jesus said it would be set up among them; but we do not hear the Apostles say so after Pentecost. Peter, on that very occasion asserts that God had made him "both Lord and Christ." Then he quotes Heb. xii. 28, "we having received a kingdom that cannot be moved," and continues affirming most certainly, that the kingdom is set up. The Doctor in replying says—"It is not written 'having received a kingdom' as I find it quoted in your letter, but Paul saith, 'we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved.' Receiving is not received." The doctor however makes no allusion here to the proclamation founded on by his correspondent.

I may mention that Mr. Black wrote an article in "The Reflector of Divine Truth," in 1853, in which he strongly maintained the setting up of the kingdom of Christ on the day of Pentecost, and seeks to make a distinction between "the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Christ," which indeed is the title of his article. He, however, omits the quotation of Heb. xii. 28, about "receiving a kingdom that cannot be removed," etc., which was the only proof he ventured on in his letter to Dr. Thomas.

At a later date, namely in 1858, I find [illegible] by Alexander Campbell [illegible] English Version of the Sacred Scriptures, published by Brother Benjamin Wilson, then of Geneva, Illinois. I must say that if this be the correct rendering of Basileia in the first preaching of the gospel of Christ, by his forerunner and himself, I feel at a loss to know where "THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM" is to be found, or at what particular point in the preaching of the Apostles the term Basileia came to be applied to the kingdom, and not simply to the personal Majesty of the Anointed One. If eggike can be rendered "has approached" or "has arrived," indifferently, and Basileia "Royal Majesty" or "Kingdom," indifferently, where is there any certainty as to the meaning of such an important matter as THE GOSPEL? It seems to me little else than "playing fast and loose" with the most momentous matters of Divine Revelation.

I regret having occupied so much space, but the matter is of vital importance, and ought to engage the interests of all who are looking for the Second Appearing of the Lord.

NOTICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS:

The book is truthful, reverent and instructive, every way worthy of the attention of those who prefer calm sentiment to sensational speculation.—The Rainbow.

We are desirous to express our sympathy with the general scope of the book, and to bespeak for it a wide and cordial reception.—The Messenger.

The volume before us is evidently the product of a thoughtful mind, and deserves the careful study of every Christian, being of a very comprehensive character, and based on Scripture. Certainly it is the best work on the subject which has come under our notice.—The Ladies Observer.

The treatment shows that the author has studied well and patiently digested his theme before writing upon it, and we feel as we read page after page, stimulated rather than clogged in our inquiry,.....The aim of the volume before us is to set the truth clearly before the mind, and so restore to its place in the consciousness of the church the hope that was once so dear to God's suffering saints, and is still so to many, but which is always unwelcome to a wealthy, cold and formal church, and loved by the world. This little volume will be received and read with pleasure by all who take interest in prophetic subjects.—Rev. Nathaniel West, D. D.

THE COMING AGE,

—ITS—

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WEETHER.—

This book is a work of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of its coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and interest with employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research, covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by gone ages and shows that the same hand is the present age, in shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that the supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the will of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the ultimo Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $1.00. Send to this office for the work.

THE APPROACHING END.

We are met this morning to consider the subject of "The Signs of Our Times." Remarks on this subject are too often made which betray a want of intelligent comprehension of the nature of the signs that are, according to Scripture, to indicate "the time of the end." A careless reading of our Lord's prophetic discourse on the Mount of Olives seems to be the cause of much of this misapprehension. His predictions of wars and rumors of wars, famines, pestilences, and earthquakes, are quoted as if they and such like things were to be signs of the end of the age. A little accurate attention to the order of his statements would at once show that, so far from this being the case, he mentions these as the characteristic and coming events of the entire interval prior to his coming. Wars and calamities, persecution and apostasy, martyrdom, treachery, abounding iniquity, gospel preaching, the fall of Jerusalem, the great tribulation of Israel, which has, as we know, extended over 1,800 years; all these things were to fill the interval, not to be signs of the immediate proximity of the second advent. How could things of common, constant occurrence be in themselves signs of any uncommon and unique crisis? What commoner thing all through the ages than wars and rumors of wars, famines, pestilences, and earthquakes? These, as marking the course of the age, can never indicate its close. What, then, are the signs we should expect?

Many persons who perceive the folly of thus looking at every great natural calamity as a sign, go to an opposite extreme, and expect wonderful, unprecedented, supernatural, and impossible signs, basing their expectations on a literal interpretation of the symbolic hieroglyphs of the Apocalypse. Such signs would be so grotesque and absurd in character, that it is insulting to human intelligence, not to say Divine revelation, to assert that they are to be expected. There is one simple and all-sufficient answer to this conception of the signs of the last days: our Lord and the Apostles alike furnish the reply. Our Lord says: "As it was in the days Noe so shall it be also in the days of the Son of Man. They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the Ark, and the flood came, and destroyed them all. Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat and drink, bought and sold, planted and builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and is destroyed them all. Even thus it shall be in the day when the Son of Man is revealed," Luke xvii. 26–30. The Apostle confirms this: "For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night. For when they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape." 1 Thess. v. 3.

If any such signs, as are imagined by some, were to precede the event, the state of society such as predicted in these passages could not by any possibility exist. If monstrous, unheard of, supernatural, preternatural events were to transpire, would they not be telegraphed the same day all over a startled world, and produce such a sense of alarm and expectation that buying and selling, planting and building, and marrying and giving in marriage, would all be arrested together, and "peace and safety" be very far from any one's lips or thoughts? And if one of the Apocalyptical prodigies is to be thus fulfilled, all of course must be so. Conceive, if you can, a succession of such supernatural prodigies, and a world asleep in fancied security, and overtaken by sudden destruction. No; there was nothing specially to alarm the antediluvians before the day that Noah entered into the ark; nothing special to startle the men of Sodom ere the fire from heaven fell upon them; and like as it was in those days so will it be in these. All going on just as usual, no single sign to attract the world's attention. "None of the wicked shall understand" the true state of affairs, only the wise and those enlightened by the word of prophecy.

It will be objected, perhaps, "But if the signs of the times, which we are expected to recognise, are neither ordinary natural events nor extraordinary unnatural ones, what are they?" Scripture abundantly answers this inquiry. They are special, but perfectly natural events, occurring in a predicted time, and various and widely differing events occurring in a combination. They are not sudden, startling, newly-produced phenomena, but definite stages in long progressive movements, whose history was written twenty-five centuries ago.

I would like to give what I believe to be the chief of these signs, and I desire rather to speak suggestively than exhaustively. We have six separate and distinct sets of signs, each one of which seems sufficient to indicate that we are on the verge of the establishment on earth of the eternal kingdom of the Son of Man—that blessed One who shall not up a reign of righteousness and peace, of which the millennial Sabbath is but the portal and introduction.

We have: first political signs; second, ecclesiastical signs; third, Jewish signs; fourth, Mohammedan signs; fifth, general social signs; and sixth, chronological signs.

1. As to political signs, allow me to make a few simple suggestions. I met coming here this morning a gentleman who has long been a Christian, a student of God's Word, a worker in his service, but he said he had bestowed only a little time on the study of prophecy: he came here rather as a learner than anything else. Now there may be many such here: let me refer for the sake of such to a great pictorial chart of the world's history contained in Dan. ii., and especially as completed with Dan. vii., that the time which we have reached in the world's history may be apparent. There we have in brief the history of the last twenty five centuries.

Let me suggest, too, that the Book of Daniel is the introduction to the Apocalypse: the Book of John the completion of the Book of Daniel. They are two parts of the same book, they treat of one subject, use the same symbols, employ the same hieroglyphics, and speak of the same course of events. These two books contain a series of visions in which the same ground is in a certain extent traversed again and again. The first vision in these two books is the simplest and most comprehensive. It starts from the time of Daniel, reaches right on to eternity, and embraces the whole course of the times of the Gentiles. In that well-known vision of the fourfold image, representing the course of four great world-empires, Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece and Rome, we have a complete chart of Gentile history.

And using the word chart reminds me of a very simple illustration that may be of value to some on the question of signs, and the point we have reached in the history of the world. Suppose you cross the ocean, and, travelling for many days or weeks, you reach a certain part of the voyage still out of sight of land, when one day you hear a rumor that the ship is approaching the port to which you are bound. You go the captain and enquire, "Is it so?" "Yes; it is; we should sight the land at three o'clock this afternoon." "How do you know?" The captain unrolls his chart, and says, "There is the port; there is our present position." He lays his finger on the exact point reached by the ship. "How do you know we are there?" "Do you see that line drawn across the chart? that is our course; we have followed it; we are just there, and will sight land at three o'clock." You ask for evidence to reassure yourself and strengthen your expectation it shall be as he says. You ask for further light on the subject, for you cannot understand how he can be so sure. "Well, our voyage has run along such and such a course, we have come so many miles, the ship has kept the track marked there; on the way we have passed certain points, certain headlands, indicated there, as Ceylon, Aden, and so forth, just as they are marked in the chart. Now the distance from Ceylon to the port we are making is so many miles; we have just run within twenty miles of it, and by three o'clock we will make the rest. The chart with the reckoning of time and distance shows exactly where we are." As he predicts so it comes to pass.

Now, God has been pleased in this Book to give us a chart of history; not merely past history but future history—anticipating history in prophecy.

He has unfolded to us the future, and given us no uncertain or dim light upon this subject, but broad and clear light. A most important part of that light is prophecy with reference to the political world, and the history of the great Gentile powers. What a marvellous thing it is, when one really considers it, that twenty-five centuries ago, when the time of the Gentiles began, when the Jewish subjection to the Gentile power commenced, when God put down Israel on account of her sins, and set up the Gentile power, that the course of Gentile power was clearly foreseen and distinctly foretold, and laid down, and marked out, and written in God's Holy Word. It was written and rewritten—visions and clearer descriptions and multiplied predictions—and the whole thing lay bare and unfolded; and all history itself has run on these lines exactly as foretold.

I can only add on this point of political signs that each power has run its appointed course. The Babylonian Empire rose, reached a certain height, ran a certain course, and was then overthrown by the Persian Empire. The Medo-Persian Empire succeeded and reached a certain development, and also fell. The Grecian Empire followed, and ruled and perished. Then rose the Roman Empire, which was to be first united and then divided. Comparing these Old [illegible] predictions with those of the New, and with history, what do we perceive? The history has run on these very lines, that these events have been fulfilled, and therefore do not remain to be fulfilled. Babylon rose and perished, so did Persia; so did Greece; so did Rome Pagan and Rome Papal. All this has been accomplished, and here we are at the close of the predicted course of the last of these four empires. We are, therefore, close to the manifestation, the unveiling, the shining forth, the glorious establishment of the kingdom of God which shall never pass away. That is the next thing to occur.

2. As regards ecclesiastical signs. I think arranging them in this order helps us to understand the matter. Of course the history of the Gentile world is a different thing from the history of the Christian Church. Take then the latter: a great deal is foretold with regard to the Christian Church. The Church was to grow, according to prophecy. Beginning with small things it was to attain success to a wonderful extent. From a small seed it was to spring into a great tree, spreading out its branches in which the birds of the air were to come and build. Then a wonderful change was, according to the prophecy and predictions of Paul, to take place. Our Lord foretold the apostasy in the Church. Paul more clearly, again and again, in epistle after epistle, spoke also of the apostasy; and John foretells it with still greater detail.

Now observe, the bearing of this on the signs of the times. Is the Church in her infancy or has she long ago reached maturity; has she, who was so small become a great spreading tree, and have the birds of the air come and built in her branches? All this has become history, all has been fulfilled; so also another event foretold has taken place. In the history of the Church there has been a great falling away from the faith, and that apostasy was distinctly foretold. I ask you to bear with me if I differ from some, as indeed I know I do. I am not here as Pope or prelate. I am here as a humble student of prophecy; we have not learnt everything yet. There is more to understand on this question. I suggest, then, to you that this word of Paul to the Thessalonians, "That day shall not come except there come the falling away first" (the apostasy), is a most important sentence in connection with the question of ecclesiastical signs of our times. The subject there is ecclesiastical; the apostasy was to take place, not in the world, but in the Christian Church. Paul is writing of what is to take place in the Church, and of that pure and practical hope; and he is writing just there and then with reference to the coming of the Lord and our gathering together to him. Now, if that is not the coming of Christ for his people, I know not what is. It is our gathering to Christ. It is not simply some manifestation of the Church after it has been gathered to Christ, but it is our gathering to him. That sense will remain even if any seek to evade its force or ignore its presence.

Now, it is a question of our gathering together to him, and Paul says, "That day shall not come except there come the falling away first." I believe that; just as I accept any other statement of inspiration. Therefore I am forced to take this position; if that predicted falling away in the Christian Church has not taken place, it lies between us and our coming Lord, and our gathering together to him. But if, on the other hand, that predicted falling away has taken place, it does not lie between us and the coming of the Lord. If we compare this falling away in the Church with the passage with which you are familiar, "In the latter times some shall depart from the faith," the word in the original Greek is the same as in the passage in Thessalonians. When we compare the two together, surely we cannot evade the conclusion that they refer to the same thing. Now the falling away in 1 Tim. iv. is described as "Giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of demons..... forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats." Reading that, we cannot fail to [illegible] portrait. It is not [illegible]

I [illegible] to the remaining signs: Mohammedan, Jewish, social, and chronological.

3. There are Mohammedan signs. Now, Mohammedanism is a tremendous fact, a tremendous factor in the world's history, in the history of Palestine, the Jewish race, and in that of the Christian Church. Mohammedanism is, as we know, a woe as it was foretold it should be a woe, a tremendous woe on the apostate Eastern Church; and of course, it has been a woe on Palestine and on the Jewish people, too. It is remarkable how the Jews have been oppressed [illegible] surrounded [illegible] of the West, as well as of the Mohammedanism in the East, [illegible] because of [illegible] Popes in Italy and [illegible] Mohammedanism has [illegible] Jewish people, besides treading [illegible] their land and erecting [illegible] of Omar, still occupying [illegible] of the temple—though there [illegible] perhaps it may not be much longer. Mohammedanism dominates one hundred and fifty millions of the human race. How long has it been in power? Some twelve or thirteen centuries. You remember how our Lord told us that Jerusalem should be trodden down "till the times of the Gentiles were fulfilled;" and that power has trodden it down. But when you look on that power, and compare its present position with its past, with what it was in the days of its pomp and pride, when all men trembled at its frown we compare that with the present state of things; when we recall the Hejira hundred years' history of the Turkish Empire; when the Crescent power (the bone-breaker, as the name means), the destroyer of men, was wielding such a deluge of blood and proving himself a resistless and merciless destroyer—when we look at the present condition of Turkey, with its [illegible] resources exhausted, [illegible] lying sick and perishing, we judge ourselves justified in drawing an important inference with regard to the times in which we live, that [illegible] ing days of the Jew [illegible] say, then, from [illegible] signs, it is very clear [illegible] drawing very nigh.

4. With regard [illegible] will say only a [illegible] have here a [illegible] by [illegible] Lindé (you can see [illegible] British Museum), in which outline is given of Jewish history [illegible] the record of the sufferings the Jews have passed through for twenty-five centuries, and especially in the last eighteen centuries. These sufferings began, I may remark, with the dethronement of Zedekiah (587 B. C.), when the throne of Judah was cast down and the people led captive, although a restoration followed. Right down from that period, through the captivity in Babylon, sufferings under the Greeks, multiplied and terrible sufferings under the Romans,—Titus, Vespasian, and Hadrian—and deeper suffering endured under so-called Christian hands—for, though they suffered from Pagans, they suffered infinitely more, and longer, and worse and more multiplied persecutions from Christians—Romans crucified them, but Christians burned them, massacred them wholesale, hunted them for long centuries from land to land. On comparing their past experiences with the present position of the Jews, we see the yoke broken, the fetters snapped, liberty, freedom, equality granted, power and position gained. We find them members of Government, teachers in universities, amassing wealth enormously, and so forth. Seeing these things, what is the conclusion you reach? That the time of Jewish restoration is come. Palestine is being lifted up on the one hand; and we seem to hear the voice which has gone forth bidding desolate Zion, though long disconsolate, lift herself, and shake her garments from the dust of ages, for the time of her liberation and emancipation has come.

5. Then there are general social signs. What is the present position of the world? Think of the progress of knowledge, the universality of science, the spread of civilization, the rapid means of locomotion, the extension of commerce, and lastly element of the [illegible] to push on [illegible] shall be increased." Look also at the increase of infidelity, even in the professing Church. Consider the judgments in recent times on the Papal power at the French Revolution. Do not all these things demonstrate that the predicted consummation [illegible] the very doors?

[illegible] night, as regards chronological signs. [illegible] words: "A [illegible] immense subject in itself, [illegible] I look on one day in a few more [illegible] chronology of the times [illegible] reached? The Scriptures contain an immense mass of chronology, and its connection with prophecy is so intimate that it is essential that we understand it. If you take a period of [illegible] thousand years taking in the Millennial age, that will extend from the days of Abraham to the days in which we are living, and right on to the close of the coming Millennial age, the dawn of which we behold, on the very verge of which we stand—if you take that period of five thousand years, you find that there is chronological prophecy with reference not only to the larger part of its extent but nearly the whole. Beginning with the prophecy of the four hundred years Israel should spend in Egypt, right on to the Exodus, then the forty years' wanderings, the three hundred and ninety of Judah's history, and seventy years of the foretold captivity, the four hundred and ninety years of the restoration; then the period of seven times, of three and a half times, of one thousand two hundred and ninety, one thousand three hundred and thirty-five, the one hundred and fifty of the Saracen woe; and the three hundred and ninety-one, or three hundred and ninety-six years of the Turkish woe; these have all been fulfilled as chronological predictions.

What, then, is our position with regard to those yet unfulfilled but equally to be fulfilled prophecies? The Millennial age is not yet, but lies in the near future; and we have a record of the rest. The four hundred years in Egypt is long past, the forty years in the wilderness has long gone by; the sixty-five years and the seventy years of captivity were fulfilled; the four hundred and ninety of the Messiah fulfilled, the great period of seven which we are in the last stages of; we have had the introductory, and the [illegible] and now the terminating events are happening as foretold. And the end of the period is characterized by the renaissance of the Jewish people. What, then, next? The Kingdom. The Kingdom of Christ. Oh, my brethren, I believe we stand this day antitypically, where Moses stood, when his feet were planted on Pisgah's height, the wilderness behind him, the land of promise before him. The forty years wanderings were well nigh over; and it is thus with us; the wilderness is behind and Canaan before us; soon shall our Lord lead his people to that land of which he has spoken. The sun that is just below the horizon is brightening the east with its increasing dawning light.

A little while, and the sun shall rise, the Sun of Righteousness with healing in his wings, to irradiate the world. Jesus will come, and fill all hearts with his presence.

Then is it for us, in these circumstances, amid the changes and fluctuations and transformations, uncertainties, denials, infidelities and apostasies of the world, to stand firm, as those established on the Rock of Ages! As Paul says, "Be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord." There are enemies about, therefore the more need of watchfulness; there is need of laboriousness because of the shortness of time. There are souls that need to be snatched from ruin; there is much work to be done and little time in which to do it. Set us with trimmed lamps, with sufficiency of oil, our loins girt, be ready with staff in hand, so that we may each say right soon, "Lord, I have finished the work that Thou gavest me to do;" so that we may from the bottom of our hearts echo that final sentence of Scripture, with profoundest meaning—"Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."—H. Grattan Guinness, in Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman.

[illegible] ponsible they are, according, [illegible] Lord's own words: and it is only an [illegible] Prayer in which [illegible] them to more [illegible] will be [illegible] Scripture are not [illegible] Mr. Guinness's unpredicted perusal of his discourse of our Lord referred to [illegible] slow ship.

Power Manifested.

It is manifestation every day quietly, but it impresses mortal man most when shown in the destructive tempest. It was thus that Elijah was shown the power of Yahweh. A paper tells us of a tempest in the Polar regions. It says:—"It is impossible to form an idea of a tempest in the Polar seas. The icebergs are like floating rocks whirled along a rapid current. The huge crystal mountains dash against each other, backward and forward, bursting with a roar like thunder, and returning to the charge until losing their equilibrium, they tumble over in a cloud of spray, upheaving the ice-fields, which fall afterwards like the crash of a whip-lash on the boiling sea. The sea-gulls fly away screaming, and often a black, shining whale comes for an instant puffing to the surface. When the midnight sun grazes the horizon, the floating mountains and the rocks seemed immersed in a wave of beautiful purple light. At forty degrees below zero the snow and human bodies smoke, which smoke changes at once into millions of particles, like needles of ice, which fill the air and make a light continuous noise, like the rustle of a stiff silk. At this temperature, the trunks of trees burst with a loud report, the rocks break up, and the earth spouts and vomits smoking water. Knives break in cutting butter. Cigars go out by contact with the ice on the beard. To talk is fatiguing. At night the eyelids are covered with a crust of ice, which must be carefully removed before one can open them."

THE RESTITUTION

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR,

Payable in advance. Three and six Months at the same rate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead, the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief in the Gospel, repentance, and immersion into it, as requisite to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

The Book of Job, called Job, Son of Zare, Son of Hruguel, Son of Resau, Son of Isaac, Son of Hairaam, as According to the Septuagint.

CHAPTER XIV.

1. For a mortal begotten of woman is short lived and full of wrath.

2. Like a flower that hath bloomed hath he fallen off: Like a shadow hath he run away and he doth not stay.

3. Wast thou not tho'author of his speech, and didst thou not authorize him to come into judgment into thy sight?

4. Who indeed shall be clean from defilement? No one of a truth.

5. Though his lifetime be but a day upon the earth; and his months unnumbered therefrom; in time hast thou set it, and he shall not overstep it.

6. Stand aside from him that he may be at ease and satisfied with that span of life like tho hireling as it were.

7. There is hope for a tree forsooth; if it be cut off; it may sprout up again, and its tap root may not fail.

8. Yea, if its root wax old in the earth, and in the rock its springing shoot come to an end,

9. At the smell of water it will flourish and bring forth a late harvest like a newly-planted.

10. But a man when he has come to an end, hath departed and should a mortal fail he is no more.

11. Yea a sea in time cometh to lack, and a river that becometh a desert river hath been dried up;

12. And man when he hath fallen asleep shall not arise until the heavens be stitched together and shall not be awakened from [illegible] Tammuz,

13. Would that thou [illegible] to keep [illegible] in Hades [illegible] rest [illegible] me until thy [illegible] shall [illegible] and until thou shalt not [illegible] for me. In which thou wilt call me to mind.

14. Yea, though a man die when he hath finished the days of his life-time, he shall live: I will patiently wait until [illegible] again come to be (that is be born again), this

15. [illegible] church shalt thou call and [illegible] and the works of thy hands I may not annul.

16. My devices moreover hast thou numbered and not one of my sins hath escaped thee.

17. Thou hast sealed up my transgressions in a covering, and thou hast put a mark of identification upon it, should I perforce evade in any respect.

18. Even a mountain falling will fall asunder and a rock will have waxed old from off its place;

19. Water hath worn away stones, and high waters have washed down the mould of the earth; and man's patient endurance hast thou destroyed:

20. Thou hast thrust him utterly away and he hath gone; Thou hast withered his face, and sent him away.

21. And though his sons have come to be many he hath not known it, and if they have come to be few he hath had no understanding of it.

22. Yea his flesh hath suffered woe and his soul hath suffered sorrow.

To the Brethren.

I would like to ask a favor of the brethren of THE RESTITUTION. I am a miller by trade, and my position here will soon be taken by one of the owners. The mill is owned by two brothers and their uncle. The third brother is expected soon which will leave me to look up another situation. Now I would like a situation some place where there is at least a small band of believers. If any of the brethren can give me any information to that effect I would be greatly obliged. I have a small family and feel it to be my duty to surround them if possible with the religion of the Bible. I am not a preacher and am poor in dollars and cents, but hope I am rich in true gospel faith. I am a brother of L. Clem, whom many of the brethren know. From him I got my first lesson in the gospel faith, as well as that of milling. I make the above explanation that the brethren may not be disappointed should they assist me to a situation. I have been in the milling business about twenty years and expect to follow the same occupation until the dear Lord shall come or the great enemy of all living shall overtake me. Yours in hope of eternal life through Christ,

D. L. P. CLEM.

THE foreign news from Oriental lands is a complicated medley. Such as it comes to us we place it before our readers in another column.

WE abound just now in original communications. Our contributors must not complain if some be delayed. Will publish as fast as we can and give general variety.

THE strikes, that indirectly were productive of disastrous riots in Chicago and elsewhere, seem to have quieted down for the present. While the insane movement has had a depressing effect on some branches of business, its severe results will be experienced by the reckless mage-workers themselves in the end.

AT the contemplated June meeting, published to be held at the Antioch Church, we hope to greet many of our brethren and sisters of the household of faith. We believe it was decided by the Board of Directors to come together two or three times during the year before the Stockholders' Annual Meeting in November, and it is therefore probable that there will be a meeting on this occasion to further the interests of THE RESTITUTION and other matters of importance. We hope our esteemed Brother Dwiggins will be home from his winter sojourn in Florida to meet with us.

WELL-MERITED PRAISE.

Bro. Wilkinson sends the following commendatory notice of his work, "The Coming Age." Being from the pen of one learned, well-posted in Millennial literature, and therefore, well qualified to speak on the subject, we give the notice with the greatest pleasure. All our readers should do well to purchase Bro. Wood's book, and give it a careful perusal. We are glad that he has resumed his pen to furnish the readers of THE RESTITUTION with some continuous articles on the same and kindred subjects.

MILLFIELD, O.

Editor Restitution:

I just received from Dr. Joseph Wild the following commendation of the "Coming Age."

"Bond St. Congregational Church, Toronto, Canada."

TORONTO, April 21, 1886.

My Dear Sir:

I have just finished reading your large book "The Coming Age." I find you have taken a marvellous sweep through the centuries. Your book, it seems to me, is enough for any one man's life's work. Yet I understand you are getting another work ready for the press even larger, but still on the same line of thought. Well I hope the good Lord will grant you health and strenght to finish it—and that I shall have the pleasure of reading it. Your books ought to have a wonderful sale. I am at a loss to see how you and your publisher can issue such splendid works so cheap. I cannot review the book I have just read, the fact is one must read it to know much about it, because it is so massive and complete. Yours kindly.

THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM. No. IV.

"The Kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost." These words of the Apostle Paul in his letter to the Romans (xiv. 17), are considered by many to be conclusive as to a present phase of the Kingdom of God; and are often quoted in proof. This I presume is derived from the use of the verb to be in the proposition that the kingdom of God is....righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. It must be maintained by those who hold a present kingdom that the Apostle's words can by no means apply to the kingdom of the future, and that therefore they must apply to some kingdom in the present. But it will be admitted that if they are capable of an application to the future, there is no necessity to apply them to the present!

Cobbin's note on the verse is, "His reign within;" evidently founded on another passage which will fall to be considered anon.

Now the fact is that Paul's words may quite well agree with either a present or a future kingdom. Let us see how they fit the kingdom considered as future. Paul while a prisoner at Rome preached the kingdom of God," and in writing to the Romans we might, on the assumption of its being a future kingdom conceive of him saying—You believed the proclamation I made to you concerning the kingdom which the God of your fathers has purposed to re-establish in the land of Israel on Mount Zion at Jerusalem. That kingdom is to be administered by the Messiah who "is a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec, being by interpretation King of Righteousness and King of Peace." That kingdom is not a kingdom of meats and drinks, about which some among you attach various ideas of lawfulness and purity, and in virtue of such ideas some of you are receiving or rejecting one another; but it is on the contrary a kingdom of "righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost."

Surely no one could with any reason say that there would be any impropriety in the Apostle making such a statement.

But this is not all. How does the matter stand as to any thing in the present interregnum being worthy to be described by the terms "righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost?" Take as an example the term "peace." It is true the Christian disciple "being justified by faith has peace with God"—that is, a relationship expressed by the term "reconciliation" has been established, and the consciousness of this enables him even to "glory in tribulation," not by any means for its own sake, but for the effect it is fitted to produce. Our Lord intimated to his disciples "in the world ye shall have tribulation:" and Paul's description of his own experiences of this are too well known to need quotation here. Of this the disciples were well warned by our Lord at an early period of his ministry, "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I come not to send peace but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance with his father," etc.—(Matt. x. 34, 35).

But was not the Messiah set forth in the prophets as "the Prince of Peace?" And did not the angelic choir at his birth celebrate his first advent with the song—"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men?" And did not the prophets describe his reign and its effects in such terms as these—"He shall judge among the nations and shall rebuke many peoples, and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation neither shall they learn war any more?" "In his days shall the righteous flourish, and ABUNDANCE of peace so long as the moon endureth?

According to popular theology these grand results are to be brought about in the Christian dispensation through the various gospel and civilizing agencies presently, at work throughout the world! And it is a well known fact that this very position on the part of the professing church, has furnished a most powerful weapon to the infidel against the truth of Christianity—namely that it has failed to accomplish what it promised after 1800 years trial!

But the explanation afforded both to the Christian and the infidel in the words quoted from Isaiah (ii.) are left out of view. It is forgotten that the antecedent of the cessation of war is the judging and rebuking of the nations by Jehovah through his Son the Anointed. That according to the same prophet (Ix. 6, 7) it is "on the throne of David" that the increase of the government and PEACE of the Prince of Peace is to be realised. As the Psalmist puts it in Psalm xlvi. "Come behold the works of Jehovah, what desolations he hath made in the earth. He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth: he breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder; he burneth the chariot in the fire".

The only question is, has the time arrived for the exercise of this branch of the Messiah's mission? Has the Messiah taken his seat on the throne of David, and has he put forth his power to judge and rebuke the nations, and to cause the destruction or disuse of their weapons of war, and so to bring about "an earth peace?"

These questions find their fitting and only answer in the promised second appearing of the Messiah. At his first advent he said—"Think not that I am come to send peace on earth." But being "the Prince of Peace," and the Divine purpose being to send him a second time to the earth for the full working out of the great mission set before him in the prophets, there is ample scope and time for the fulfilment of every word that has been written. It is too readily forgotten that, although there is a long lapse of time during which an apparent failure of the Divine promises takes place, "the Lord is not slack concerning his promise as some men count slackness;" and that "one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." It is nearly 4000 years since Jehovah called Abraham, one purpose expressly stated being that "all the nations of the earth might be blessed." As a father step toward this great end, he selected the descendants of Abraham in the line of Jacob as his own peculiar nation, as a testimony against surrounding idolatry, as the depositary of his oracles, and the witness to his purposes, both as regards the now past and the yet future. As it is written, "The Gentiles (or the nations) shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy vision." "And the heathen (or the nations) shall know that I the Lord do sanctify Israel, when my sanctuary (or temple) shall be in the midst of them for evermore."

This relation of restored Israel to the blessedness of the nations is well depicted in some of the Psalms. Take for example the lxvii., and keep in mind that it is a song of the nation of Israel:—

"O God be merciful unto us, and bless us;
And cause thy face to shine upon us.

That thy way may be known upon earth,
THY SAVING HEALTH AMONG ALL NATIONS.

Let the people praise thee, O God,
Let all the people praise thee.

O, let the nations be glad,
And sing for joy.

For thou shalt judge the people righteously,
AND GOVERN THE NATIONS UPON EARTH.

Let the people praise thee, O God,
Let all the people praise thee.

Then shall the earth yield her increase;
And God, even our own God, shall bless us.

God shall bless us;
And all the ends of the earth shall fear him."

The remarks I have made as to "PEACE" as a characteristic of the kingdom of God, might easily be extended, and applied to the "righteousness and joy," mentioned by the Apostle. The absence of these qualities in the present time is only too apparent to need any special statement. The night is not yet with the light and the truth, and certainly joy is very far from being universal. But the Psalm just quoted outlines both the righteousness and joy and as well as the peace of the Messiah's government, which shall bless the nations.

The professing church which is considered to be the kingdom of God is very little better in many respects than the world. The Roman Catholic church has been an instrument of tyranny for upwards of 1000 years, and the various Protestant bodies which have separated from it, such as the Church of England, etc., have retained but too much of the same spirit. Even the "Pilgrim Fathers" who were driven into exile by the high handed oppression of the oligarchy of a dominant church, backed by the power of a tyrannical government, were not slow in their new country, to exercise intolerances similar in kind, if not in degree, against all who presumed to differ from them in opinion.

And perhaps it would not be going too far to say that even among the true disciples of Christ, the principle of self-love, self-conceit, and self-gratification is, in too many cases, but little affected by the power of the truth; and to "do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with God," is a work far too hard for many who are contemplating a position in the kingdom of God where these principles shall be universal.

I just notice in closing that the Apostle adds a reason to his statement about the kingdom of God in this passage, He says—"For he that in these things serveth Christ is acceptable to God and approved of men." That is, the disciple who puts these principles of the FUTURE kingdom into practice now, is preparing himself for their full development and manifestation in the coming kingdom. Luke xvii. 21; John xviii. in a future article.

LOST.

People lose a great many things. Health, money, houses, goods and friends, are lost: goods, are burned, houses and lots disappear, repulsive features, love fades away, cherished companions sink into the grave. But what if our confidence in God be lost? What if the foundations be removed? What a fearful thing when a dreadful storm comes, to have neglected and trusted God and then to find Him up as unable or unwilling to help! The maker and upholder of all things, unable to do that which we ask the dear Father, unwilling to give his children what they need! The thought is simply absurd, but the poor dispairing one is afflicted. Crops fail, year after year there is no blessing on the labor of his hands: the blight, the flood, the drought, the locust destroys. He cannot see why it is, he prays, but there seems to come no answer to his prayer. His heart is hardened. Instead of grateful thanks for the blessings that remain, there is cursing and turning back to Egypt. Yet the Lord does not willingly afflict, nor does he chasten in anger.

Poor fainting one! have you studied to know the meaning of your afflictions? You punish your children: you deprive them of pleasure, you force them to suffer the seeming loss of your love: do you do this because you hate them? They ask you to withdraw your displeasure and to give them the things that they desire, they are afflicted under your chastening, but you do not think it for their good to remove your hand, nor to answer their prayers. Yet, all the time your heart is aching for them, and full of love. Cannot you see that it is just so with God? You look at the highest good of your child, God looks at your highest good. You want to bring your child in subjection to the law of right, so that it may be upright and happy hereafter. God is dealing in the same way with you. We, ourselves have been subject to earthly parents, shall we not much rather be in subjection to the Father of Spirits and live?

But you don't want to be in subjection; that is where the trouble comes in. You forget the patience of Job, and the trial of the Israelites in the wilderness. You sing:—

"Nearer my God, nearer to thee,
E'en though it be a cross,
That raiseth me."

But when the cross comes, you don't want the cross! The answered prayer is too much for your strength to bear.

But what if you were properly exercised, or instructed by the chastening? Would it not afterward yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness?

"Despise not the chastening of the Almighty nor faint when rebuked of him." Whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth, and [illegible] with every son whom [illegible] of this [illegible] escapes.

If chastened not, then are ye bastards and not sons. The chastening is the proof that you are really acknowledged of God as his children.

As a dear sister said in a recent letter to me, "I would have sorrow that I might know the joy of being comforted by such a loving friend."

"As a child
Those song-bird sisters the wood forevermore,
Sang to us first and by mother's mouth,
Till sinking on her breast, love reconciled
Its sleepy ch[illegible] father [illegible] slept before."

So would I in [illegible] and loss and [illegible] "the Lamb of [illegible] and died for [illegible] suffering, was [illegible] but "a light affliction [illegible] of all things [illegible] Christ."

"Th[illegible] of all I want
Ex[illegible] I find."

My faith [illegible] to the Mighty One even in grief. I seem to see not the troubles of the way, in the brightness of the coming glory, nearer, nearer, clearer, shine the spires of the palaces of Home!

Let the crosses come, if through them, come the joy, the fitness for God's everlasting kingdom!

In tender love.

THE POWERS APPLY TO GREECE.

LONDON, May 5.—On the initiative of England a collective note, signed by England, Germany, Austria, Russia, and Italy, was presented to Greece today. The note says that while the powers recognize the friendly intervention of France referred to by Greece in her answer to the ultimatum as having been accepted and acted upon before the receipt of the ultimatum, they must require some more precise assurances that Greece will disarm. It is added that unless the demands of the powers are promptly acceded to the ministers will withdraw their Ministers from Athens.

ATHENS, May 5.—It is reported that the Government will decree disbanding the [illegible] will be withheld unless the [illegible] of the powers be withdrawn and the combined squadron retire.

LONDON, May 5.—The news from Burmah today is that the natives, with the assistance of the Dacoits, have, temporarily at least, got the better of the British army of occupation. One despatch says that the insurgents have got possession of Mandalay, and have destroyed by fire no less than 4,000 houses. Among the buildings burned were the Chinese and Siamese bazaars.

The hostility of the natives who remain loyal to the dethroned King Thebaw to the Chinese is intense, because of China's endorsement of Great Britain's seizure of Burmah. The officers commanding the British forces have telegraphed to Lord Dufferin that they are powerless to prevent rioting, and urgently ask for reinforcements.

ATHENS, May 7.—All the foreign Ministers have embarked on vessels of their respective nations to depart from Greece. The powers have given orders to their fleets to blockade the Greek ports.

The soldiers at the garrison here received with cheers the orders to march to the frontier.

Tewfik Bey, the Turkish Minister, when he departed hence today took with him all the members of the staff of the Turkish legation, and caused all his and their personal effects to be removed.

The secretaries of the other foreign legations will remain in an unofficial capacity for a time at least. The Russian Minister did not leave when the other Ministers departed, not having been instructed to do so.

The Peloponnesian army has been ordered to Thessaly.

The Government has sent a gunboat to Constantinople to take away from the Turkish capital M. Conduriott, the Greek Minister.

The populace are enthusiastic over the prospect of war with Turkey. Soldiers are parading the streets, singing patriotic songs. They are everywhere cheered and are at present the most popular persons in the city. A large number of soldiers remain here.

The foreign squadron has returned to Suda Bay. The Greek fleet has left Salamis and, it is believed, has gone to Poros. It is not believed here that Russia will take any share with the other powers in the ulterior work of coercion against Greece.

The movements of the Turkish army threaten to make Thessaly the scene of the first warlike operations. The indications now point to a Turkish advance by way of Larissa. The Greek reserves at Volo and Velestino have [illegible] to the front. The regiment designated the King's Escort is ready to start for the front. The Government has announced its intention of defending Greek territory against any and all attempts by foreign soldiers.

Two battalions of the Athens garrison have already started for the frontier. The soldiers went out with great enthusiasm. They will embark at Laurium in order to avoid the blockaders stationed to cover the other water routes. Turkish troops are massing at Prevesa.

ATHENS, Greece, May 8.—Germany, Austria, England, Russia and Italy have notified Greece that a blockade of her ports has been ordered.

The Government's official journal today states that the movements of the Greek army must not be taken to indicate warlike intentions on the part of the Government. The Government has decided, adds the Journal, to refrain from disturbing the peace, but believes it necessary, however, to be prepared to resist any hostilities which may be inaugurated by others.

The opposition papers denounce the injustice of the powers in their policy of coercion toward Greece, although they recognize the faults of Premier Delyannis and his Government.

The Government Ministry of Greece has resigned, the King having censured the Premier for existing national troubles. The naval fleets of the powers have blockaded every Grecian port.

I see it is time I should renew my subscription for our paper, I say "our" paper, for it seems to me, we of the one faith should all take as much interest in it as possible. I have been trying to think of some one I might get to send with me, but I am the only one of our faith in this neighborhood, and my health is not good, so I cannot get around very well to hunt them up, as I should like to do.

Selection.

Heb. xi. 39, 40.

The apostle has completed his enumeration of the long line of worthies who were well spoken of on account of their faith. It was their faith that marked them out before man and God. Much good could not be affirmed of them in many respects,—but this could be said, "they believed." They were formed out of no better clay than others. They possessed natures not less defiled. But still "they believed." It was their believing that brought them nigh to God at first: it was their believing that kept them continually nigh. It was simply as believers that God recognised them; and it was simply as believers that they walked with God. Their's was a believing life from first to last. And such is the life of every saint. Such is to be the Church's life until the Lord come. She has everything in promise, nothing in possession. She has a kingdom in reversion, but not an inch of ground in actual enjoyment now. Nor is one age or section of the Church better than another in this respect: all are the same; all have the same hope,—but not one has received the inheritance. That inheritance is equally a future thing to all; all are to receive it together; not one before the other. This is, in substance, the apostle's statement in the passage before us, which has been so often discussed, but little understood:—

"All these (ancient believers), though they received a good report on account of their faith, yet were not put in possession of the thing promised." They neither received the inheritance at the time they were here, nor have they received it since. It is still one of the 'good things' to come."

Then follows a clause which ought either to be read as a parenthesis, or placed at the end of the verse. Let us treat it as a parenthesis, and omit it until we have connected the last clause of the verse with the 39th. The whole would run thus:—"These all, though they received a good report on account of their faith, yet did not receive the thing promised, in order that they, without us, should not be perfected." That is to say, the actual possession of the inheritance (or thing promised) has not been given; it has been deferred (till the Lord come), in order that no age or section of the Church should be perfectly blest and glorified without all the rest; for all must be raised together; all must be caught up together; all must be crowned together.

What, then, is the meaning of the parenthesis? Its meaning is as follows:—The apostle had spoken of the promise, or thing promised; and having mentioned this, he adds parenthetically, by way of explanation, "For God has indeed some better thing in view for us, no less than for them." That is to say, "The inheritance is for us, as well as for them; the promise was indeed made to them, but it includes us also." The "better thing" is not to be taken as meaning some better thing for us than what they possessed. No. But as referring to something better than any had received; something which eye had not seen, nor ear heard; something more glorious than had ever been enjoyed by any saint, or any portion of the Church, from the beginning.

That "better thing" is the inheritance—the kingdom. This inheritance belongs to us who live in these latter days, no less than to those in the earlier times. It is an inheritance which God himself has prepared. It is an inheritance which becomes ours, in title and right, the moment that we believe,—but which shall be enjoyed by none until the Lord come.

Hence it is to the day of the Lord that we look as to the day of our common re-entrance into Eden—the day when, as one vast multitude out of every nation, we shall together enter in through the gates into the city—the day of our common crowning, our common triumph; for it is to be one crowning, one triumph, one entrance for the whole Church from the beginning: they are not crowned alone, or in fragments, or in sections,—but in one glorious hour they receive their everlasting crowns, and take their seats in simultaneous gladness upon the long-expected throne.

DIED.

LEE.—Fell asleep in Jesus, the Life-Giver, at Hamilton, Ont., May 2, 1886, Brother Charles Lee, aged 77 years, 2 months and 15 days.

Brother Lee for many years was a valuable member of the Church of England, but upon hearing the gospel about 24 years ago, preached by St. Paul in the seven hilled city in his own hired house, Acts xxviii. 30, 31, (the city contained at that time four million, one hundred and thirty seven thousand human beings,) Brother Lee and his good wife, who survives him, after a faithful examination of the doctrine, embraced it heartily and at once obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered for the confession of sins, subsequent to an intelligent faith. At once meetings were established in their house, and as their number increased a hall was rented. Brother Lee being at that time in possession of wealth, energy, an active mind and the ability to present what he believed to those who were willing to learn from the Living Oracles, therefore a heavy burden fell upon him which he willingly performed or carried.

Brother Lee was not like some who only have their tongue converted, only to be used when it would not require a sacrifice. But his pocket and all that he possessed was laid on the altar for Christ. Hence his house was open to all who were in love with the truth, and liberally did he aid them in their labor of love to their fellowmen. His liberality was not confined to the household of faith but was extended to others. Into new fields he has taken the writer to preach the gospel—the kingdom of God. And when Christadelphianism entered Hamilton, and rent the church into fragments, he stood firm on the original platform, believing that St. Paul told the truth when he said, "the dead shall be raised incorruptible," and thus by his faith and practice saved many from embracing this false doctrine.

Some 24 years have rolled away since I first became acquainted with Brother and Sister Lee, and their house has always been my home when preaching in Hamilton. I loved him dearly, and deeply do I feel the loss I have sustained in his death. His death is a great loss to the Church of God in Hamilton. By his request made two years ago to the writer, Rev. Walter Reid preached a discourse upon [illegible] Thess. iv. 13–18 which was listened to with profound attention. Then we laid him aside to rest in the dust until God shall send Jesus to raise by his power all those whom the Father has given to him in the plan of human redemption. Brother Lee was a good husband, a good father and a valuable member of the Church of God. He was good citizen as the following obituary notice, published in the Hamilton Spectator positively asserts:

"By the death of ex-Ald. Charles Lee, Hamilton loses one of her oldest citizens, a man who saw the growth of the city out of a wilderness. Mr. Lee died on Sunday after a protracted and painful illness. He was born in the vicinity of Hamilton some 77 years ago, when as yet there was only a few wooden houses on the present site of the city, and the old gentleman has often been heard to say that in his boyhood he heard the howl of the wolf ring through the woods where tall factory chimneys send up to heaven the daily incense of labor, and where there are streets of houses whose inmates never saw a wild animal except in cages. Mr. Lee for many years carried on business as a shipwright and wharfinger. He was elected to a seat at the city council board for St. Andrew's ward in 1874, and in the following two years was returned for ward 5. In 1880 he was again elected for ward 6, and held his seat till the close of 1882, when he retired. He was a man of respectable abilities, and sterling, upright character. The funeral will take place tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock at his late residence, 373 Hughson street, north."

Inclosed you will find Post Office order to pay for THE RESTITUTION for two trial subscribers for three months each, also one copy of Mrs. H. V. Reed's "Creation vs. Evolution." Some time back I sent in six names and these two will make eight. It is hard to get any of the sects to take the paper. I do all that I can to circulate THE RESTITUTION, for I think it is the best paper printed. It comes nearer advocating real Bible truth all the time than any paper that I have ever read, and I have read nearly all of them. I hope Brother Chaplin may live long and have good health, and may the blessings of God rest and abide with all the brethren everywhere.

WAITING.

The day is done;
Soft as a dream the sunset fades and dies,
And silent stars amid the dusky skies,
Shine one by one.

The shadows wait!
And climbing upward over spires and towers,
Seem drawing softly this dull earth of ours
To heaven's gate.

We wait the night
With no vain thought of darkness or of dread,
But dreams of peace for weary heart and head,
And slumbers light.

We wait, nor fear
The few short hours of silence and of gloom
Before the eastern hills shall blush with bloom,
And morn be near.

My God! my all!
When the dim hour draws near us by thy grace,
To meet thy white death-angel face to face,
And hear thy call:

When life lies low—
A gasping shadow by the altar stairs
That leadeth up from darkness unawares,
Then let me wait
In faith and trust with prayers and blessings
For—
All mindful of the morning light beyond—
Before the gate.

Not sore distrest;
Knowingly to-day Thou doll garb away,
Ill-known in peace to wait the coming day,
And find our rest.

PROPHETIC PROBLEMS.—GATHERING AGENTS.

Who shall gather the kings of the earth and of the whole world to the coming battle? Verses 13 and 14 of Rev. xvi. name the gathering agents. "And I saw three unclean spirits, like frogs, (come) out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet; for they are the spirits of devils (demons) working miracles (wonders), which go forth unto the kings of the earth and the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty." Vss. 15, 16, "Behold I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame. And he (Jehovah) gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon."

We have now given the agents, three classes of unclean (wicked) demons, their mission to deceive the whole satanic world, to drill and muster them into service, and its accomplishment. Their work belongs especially to the period covered by the sixth vial. Let us proceed to investigate the particulars of this "miraculous" era. Our first problem we may consider as satisfactorily solved, viz, that we are living under the period occupied by the sixth vial.

2. On what is that vial poured out? The text says, "Upon the great river Euphrates." The symbolic or literal Euphrates? The masses of expositors say, on the symbolic Euphrates, by which they mean the Ottoman Empire. This the Bible does not affirm; but should we admit that such a river is implied, still the symbol is no where explained or interpreted, which is fatal to that view, for when a word is used in a tropical sense (out of its usual meaning) to make it part of revelation it must somewhere be interpreted. The Euphrates, one of the rivers of Eden, is the great river of southwestern Asia. It is 1600 miles long, and discharged more water in ancient times than the Danube. It is the most noted river of the Orient. On its waters were Paradise, Nineveh, Babylon and other noted cities. It was for centuries the eastern boundary of the Roman Empire. It resisted the southwestern march of the Turk for many generations. It has always been a river of national boundaries, offering a great barrier to invading armies. At present we are interested especially in its Bible history.

It is named twenty times, eighteen times in the Old Testament as follows: Gen. ii. 14, And the fourth river is the Euphrates. Unto the great river Euphrates. Gen. xv. 18, Here it is the eastern boundary of the land deeded by God to Abraham. "Unto the great river, the river Euphrates." Deut. i. 7. East boundary. "From the river, the river Euphrates." Deut. xi. 24. East boundary. "Even unto the great river, the river Euphrates." Josh. i. 4. Boundary. "David smote also Hadadezer, the son of Rehob, king of Zobar, as he went to recover his border at the river Euphrates." 2 Sam. viii. 4. Boundary. "As he (David) went to establish dominion by the river Euphrates." 1 Chron. xviii. 3. "In his (Josiah's) days Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt, went up against the king of Assyria to the river Euphrates." 2 Kings xxiii. 29. "And king Josiah went against him, and he (king of Assyria) slew him at Megiddo." Rec Zech. xii. 11. We would here remark that in this passage we have all things and acts literal. Armageddon, in Rev. xvi. 16, is probably the same place as Megiddo, and is also literal, and if the places are literal, and Euphrates (2 Kings xxiii. 29) is literal, why not the Euphrates of Rev. xvi. 12? (See 2 Chron. xxxv. 20.) "For the king of Babylon had taken from the river of Egypt unto the river Euphrates all that pertained to the king of Egypt." 2 Kings xxiv. 7. "And eastward he (Reuben) inhabited unto the entering in of the wilderness from the Euphrates." 1 Chron. v. 9. Reuben's east boundary.

So far our quotations are from books of Bible history. These are followed by a few from the ancient prophets. "Take the girdle that thou hast got, which (is) upon thy loins, and arise, go to the Euphrates, and hide it there in a hole of the rock. So I went and hid it by Euphrates." Jer. xiii. 4, 5. The act was literal; so were the actor, the girdle and the river, intending to illustrate the future captivity in Babylon. See vs. 7; also xlv. 2, 9, 10. "And it shall be, when thou hast made an end of reading this book, (that) thou shalt bind a stone to it and cast it into the midst of Euphrates." Jer. li. 64. Emblem of the fall of Babylon. Of these 18 passages there is no departure from the literal signification of the word Euphrates. In every place it is the name of the same river Euphrates. Of this there can be no possible doubt.

Euphrates is found only in two other passages in the Bible, viz., John's Rev. ix. 14, and xvi. 12. Rev. ix. 14 is as follows: "Saying to the sixth angel which had the trumpet. Loose the four angels which are bound in (at) the great river Euphrates." Who are here the active death agents? Only one correct answer can be given, viz., four angels bound at the great river Euphrates. These angels were truly the four Sultanies of the Ottoman Empire, who had been restrained to the vicinity of that river during the centuries of the crusades. Their westward progress towards Constantinople, the capital of the Greek empire, had been interrupted by the Crusaders. These four Sultanies were God's messengers (angels) for a future work. Till their time came to enter upon the work of their mission they were bound—bound by the rules of nations. When that time of action came, the command went forth, Loose, etc. If, then, in the vision of Rev. ix. 14, the four bound angels represent the Turkish power—the river Euphrates does not symbolize it. Euphrates is here the literal great river, which is so often termed, Great River Euphrates, the boundary river.

We now come to notice the last place in the Bible where the name is used, viz. Rev. xvi. 12. The reader may compare the original Greek text and the authorized version with the revised version, which is as follows: And the sixth poured out his bowl upon the great river, the (river) Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way might be made ready for the kings that (come) from the sunrising. And I saw (coming) out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet, three unclean spirits as it were frogs; for they are spirits of devils (demons, marg.) working signs; which go forth unto (upon) the kings of the whole world (inhabited earth) to gather them together unto the war of the great day of God, the Almighty. (Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked and they see his shame.) And they gathered them together into the place which is called in Hebrew, Har-Magedon." In the revised version it reads, And they—unclean spirits—gathered them; in the authorized version it is singular, he—Jehovah—gathered. They come up under visible commanders, yet led by their invisible judge. The idea is expressed in Eze. xxxvii. 16, "And thou—Gog—shalt come up against my people of Israel, as a cloud to cover the land; it shall be in the latter days, and I will bring thee against my land, that the heathen may know me. When I shall be sanctified in thee, O Gog, before their eyes."

We now have, in our quotation from Rev. xvi. 12–18, the pouring out of the sixth vial (bowl), upon what it is emptied, its effect upon the waters, its design and ultimate results. We have seen that in 19 passages out of 20 Euphrates is the name of a great river; that in the 19th text, Rev. ix. 14, John in the vision of the sixth or second woe trumpet, makes it the literal river of southwestern Asia; that if it had been designed to have a tropical meaning the grammar of symbolization requires that the symbol should somewhere in the Scriptures be interpreted, but it is not. The waters in Rev. xvii. 10 are explained in vs. 15. The 6th vial is emptied upon the great river and that great river is interpreted to be the Euphrates. Again, if the Ottoman empire is the mystic Euphrates (which we deny) then the analogy of symbolic relationship would require the Mohammedan (not the Papal) priesthood to be the mystic Babylon. This would be a very serious error; for no one will pretend that the Roman hierarchy grew out of the Ottoman empire or was ever sustained by it; and yet the laws of symbols require the same relationship between the Mystic Babylon and the Mystic Euphrates (if there be such a river,) as there was between the literal Babylon and the literal Euphrates. The great river of Rev. xvi. 12 is, therefore, what it is declared to be, the (river) Euphrates, and the sixth bowl is turned bottom upwards over the literal waters of the literal great river, the (river) Euphrates. No other legitimate conclusion can we reach.

3. Why was it emptied upon the literal waters of that literal river? Literally and most emphatically to dry up, waste and dissipate its waters, for a specific purpose. It will now be necessary to give a literal and reasonable explanation of the way and results of this literal drying up of the waters of the Euphrates. (a) It will be seen from the Bible history of that river, which we have given, that it was very early a national boundary river, separating the land of Israel from the eastern nations. It was like a wall of defence. Such a barrier was a defence to Israel in their early nationality. During their early history the channel of this river was kept open. But after the breaking up of the Hebrew nationality this rampart was not so necessary. Still during the pure iron age of the Roman Empire, before that scattered people had been fully settled in their western home, but were distributed through that vast empire, the Euphrates continued to be their eastern boundary to keep back the "kings of the east." Jehovah's purpose towards his land and his ancient people evidently required the eastern monarchs to be restrained till the time of their great national judgments upon the mountains of Israel. See Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix.

How could the waters be literally dried up? Jehovah effects great natural changes by what we term physical causes. So it was with the Red Sea when he wanted Israel to cross it. A vehement wind was his executive angel, and by it the waters were parted—dried up. So of the Euphrates. No special miracle, but simply the combination of physical causes to produce certain physical results for special purposes. Let us see how the waters of the great river, the (river) Euphrates, could be dried up by the operation of natural causes. The taking of Babylon by Cyrus was accomplished by diverting its waters, by the work of an army using human implements, yet God superintended the operation and by so doing he rendered the river useless as a defence. Read Isaiah xliv. 21–28 and xlv. 1–5. There we learn that God claims such as his own work. How clear and sublime, "Remember these, O Jacob and Israel, for thou (art) my servant; O Israel thou shalt not be forgotten of me. I have blotted out as a thick cloud thy transgressions and as a cloud thy sins; return unto me for I have redeemed thee. Sing, O ye heavens, for the Lord hath done (it); shout ye lower parts of the earth, break forth into singing ye mountains. O forest, and every tree therein; for the Lord hath redeemed Jacob and glorified himself in Israel. Thus saith the Lord thy Redeemer, and he that formed thee from the womb, I [am] the Lord that maketh all [things], that stretcheth forth the heavens alone, that spreadeth abroad the earth by myself. That frustrateth the tokens of the liars, and maketh divines mad; that turneth wise men backward and maketh their knowledge foolish. That confirmeth the word of his servant, and performeth the counsel of his messengers [angels], that saith to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be inhabited, and to the cities of Judah, Ye shall be built, and I will raise up the decayed places thereof; that saith to the deep, be dry, and I will dry up thy rivers [by withholding the rains]. That saith of Cyrus [long before his birth], [He is] my shepherd and shall perform all my pleasure; even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built, and to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid. Thus saith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden to subdue nations before him, and I will loose the loins of kings to open before him the two-leaved gates, and the gates shall not be shut. I will go before thee and make the crooked places straight. I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron. I will give thee the treasures of darkness and hidden riches of secret places: that thou mayest know that I the Lord that call [thee] by thy names art the God of Israel. For my servant's sake, and Israel [redacted] even called thee by thy name, I have surnamed thee, though thou hast not known me.

[redacted]

Illiterate? [redacted] you are learned, [redacted] the school of Jesus, [redacted] the pearl of great price, the wisdom that is more precious than rubies. How our hearts rejoiced over your letter! We had sent a prayer with the words that we wrote; here was the proof that that prayer was answered, and that what we had asked on bended knees, before taking the pen into our hands had been granted.

We "love the Lord because he hath heard our voice and our supplications, he hath inclined his ear unto us, therefore will we call upon him as long as we live."

We asked of him that our words might prove a blessing to some dear fainting heart; it has been so, and now, "oh magnify the Lord with us and let us exalt his name together!"

It is fitting that we should thus praise his holy name for he doeth wonderful things. You dear sister "sought the Lord and he heard you and delivered you from all your fears."

May we ever thus seek him. Do write again. S. ROXANA WINCH.

"I Shall be Satisfied."

I shall be satisfied when I awake
In the full brightness of the coming day;
When all the shadows that life's sorrows make
Like morning mists shall flee and flee away.

I shall be satisfied when I am done
With sowing tear-steeped seed on barren soil,
And I shall rest the noble life begun
Where weariness is not, nor work is toil.

I shall be satisfied when I awake
From fevered slumber and from waking dreams,
And through the clouds the endless morn shall break
Across the fadeless fields and living streams.

Yet more than all, I shall be satisfied
When I shall waken in His likeness there,
In heart and life as wholly purified,
Freed from this heavy weight of sinful care.

The Temple, The Cross, The Throne.

I rose very early this morning, for the birds were sweetly singing in our garden, and I could not sleep. As I looked from my window toward the mountain opposite, skirting our pleasant plain, I thought of a boy twelve years of age, who lived [redacted] ago, in a [redacted] though of him as [redacted] been painted by that celebrated artist, Holman Hunt, and as his fond mother might have described him, as he stood before her at Nazareth, ready for a journey, on a spring morning. "How fair and how pleasant art thou: fairer than the children of men. Sweet is thy voice, and thy countenance is comely."

We have a telescope, through which it is a great pleasure, on clear evenings, to watch the changes in the moon. I love to remember that it is the very same moon upon which the boy had been eagerly gazing, from the hills which surrounded his home, since the evening of the first day of the month "Nisan," meaning, some tell us, "Flight," because of the flight of the children of Israel out of Egypt, which occurred in this month. The new moon had first appeared on that evening over the tops of the distant mountains, and the sacred new year of the Jewish nation had begun. Nearly two weeks had passed, and the moon was now almost full. It would be full on the fourteenth day. Then the great yearly Feast of the Passover would be kept with gladness in the city of Jerusalem, which the boy and his mother were to attend. The morning of the day on which he was to leave his home having come, I think of him as setting forth upon the journey with a joyful heart, and as singing on the way: "My feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem! Joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving and the voice of melody. I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people."

They entered Jerusalem, the holy city, and drew near to the holy Temple, his Father's house, for this Son of Mary, the Holy Child Jesus, was the Son of God.

Many Jews had come to Jerusalem to attend the feast, and on the afternoon of the fourteenth day the courts of the Temple were filled with worshipers, who had each brought a lamb without spot or blemish. As the sun was setting, the lamb was slain, and its blood, received into a basin, was given to the priests to be sprinkled on the altar; and the [redacted] lamb was also presented to the priests, [redacted] incense when the evening sacrifice [redacted]. Each man then carried his lamb home to be roasted whole, [redacted] been being broken. [redacted] to be eaten in the evening with bitter herbs and unleavened bread, and this bitterness made of sour and water. When the family had gathered around the table, and a blessing had been asked, some of the bitter herbs were eaten, then the unleavened bread. After these, the lamb was placed upon the table before the father or head of the family, and one of the children always asked the meaning of the feast. He was answered: "It is the sacrifice of the Lord's passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when he smote the Egyptians and delivered our houses." The whole story of the deliverance from Egypt was then told. After the passover feast the people continued to eat unleavened bread seven days, and during these days many thank-offerings were presented to God.

The festival now over, a large company left Jerusalem to return home, and among these was the mother of Jesus. She had proceeded quite a distance on her way, when, missing her son, and not finding him, as she had expected, among her relatives, she hurried back to Jerusalem, seeking him there. After three days, she entered one of the courts of the Temple, and found him among the teachers of the law, "hearing them and asking them questions." I see her, overjoyed, running to him, and throwing her arms around his neck, with tears in her eyes, saying: "Son, I have sought thee, sorrowing!" His answer reminded her that he was more than her son, that God was his Father, and in his Father's house she should have expected to find him. Even then he must have know that he was "The Lamb of God," "without blemish and without spot," and that he would one day become "our passover, sacrificed for us." Returning with his mother to Nazareth, he remained there eighteen years, no doubt visiting Jerusalem at the great yearly feasts. At the end of these years, the boy, now grown to be a man, entered upon his great work, and for three years went everywhere, teaching and healing the people.

The fourteenth day of the same month, Nisan, had come again. Jesus was in Jerusalem at the Feast. He had eaten the Passover Supper with his disciples, and had gone with them to the Mount of Olives, where was a garden called Gethsemane, into which he entered with his disciples. He was exceedingly sorrowful. Being in agony, he sweat as it were great drops of blood. Here he was seized by a company of soldiers, led by the traitor Judas, and taken away to his enemies, [redacted] to put him to [redacted] Jews prevailed on Pilate, the Roman Governor, to deliver him to be crucified, and on the day following, which we call "Good Friday," he was led as a lamb to the slaughter."

John, the beloved disciple, who was with Jesus in the Garden on that sad night, long afterwards wrote these words:

"I looked, and, behold, a door was opened in heaven:....and, behold, a throne was set in heaven, and one sat on the throne. ....And, lo, in the midst of the throne stood a Lamb as it had been slain,.....and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, saying with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing.

"'Worthy the Lamb that died,' they cry,
'To be exalted thus;'
'Worthy the Lamb,' our lips reply,
'For he was slain for us.'"

Dear Children.

It is written, "And God called the light Day, and the darkness he called Night."

The sweet singer of Israel also tuned his harp with the beautiful melody. "Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge. There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard." We naturally assimilate everything that is gloomy and sad with night, and yet one third of our life, from infancy to old age, is wrapped in night's peaceful folds. How gently she draws her sombre curtains, sparkling with brilliant stars, sweetly whispering, rest weary earth, rest. In her solemn stillness, she comes with many a precious gift, distilling from her hushed voice, the breath of sweet dew, reviving the exhausted life of every flower, and so small is its drop, that the tiniest gem of nature, wherever hid, draws in through its veins of beauty, almost a new birth, imparting a richer hue. It is when the dawn comes, sending forth the bright beams of the sun from the east, that we behold her refreshing shower, each sparkling drop brilliant with light is made manifest, for light is the life of dew.

And when the ruler of the day has run his course, and sinks behind the western sky, night comes with peace, laying on her sweet bosom earth's weary children, inviting the sorrowful, sad and lonely to rest in the quiet embrace, stilling with her soft control the voice of the sick and restless babe, and her dusky shadow causes the sweet warbler of the woods to hide its head. The cattle upon ten thousand hills to forget their natural craving, and the busy humming bee is hushed by her soft touch. In this we can see God's faithfulness every night, and can say with the noble shepherd boy, These all wait upon God.

Your affectionate Teacher.

Conference Report.

The Advent Christian Conference of Northwestern Pennsylvania met in quarterly session with the church at Edinboro, April 17, and was called to order by the chair. Ministers present, Sister L. M. Stoddard, Elders C. W. Stephens of Oil City, M. R. Miles of Wolcott, N. Y., Newell Wood of East Branch and J. W. Niles of Edinboro. Minutes of the previous meeting read and approved. The reports of ministers and delegates present showed the churches in this conference to be in good working order and alive to the signs of the times, each church sustaining a Sunday school. Brother Grove, in behalf of Plum and Wallaceville, invited the annual session in July to be held at Wallaceville in connection with a grove meeting. Brethren Saley and Grove were then appointed to select the third person and act as a committee to prepare a place for holding the meeting. The church at Edinboro has been greatly refreshed and strengthened by the coming together of the brethren, and their testimony that the Lord is leading us as a people and as individuals. After the meeting service we repaired to the water side and five were buried in the likeness of Christ's death and raised to walk, as we trust, in newness of life. Adjourned to meet at the call of the chair.

DECEITFUL CALM.

The winds are still! The sea lies all unruffled
Beneath a cloudless sky! The morn is bright!
Yet, Lord, I feel the need of Thee embodied.
Come nearer to me in this place of light!
The night must fall; the storm will break at length—

Oh, give me strength!

So well, so well I know the treacherous seeming
Of days like this. They are too heavenly fair.
These waves that laugh like happy children dreaming
Are mighty forces brewing some despair
For thoughtless hearts. And ere the hour of need

Let mine take heed.

Joy can not last. It must give place to sorrow
As certainly as solar systems roll;
I would not wait till that time comes, to borrow
The strength prayer offers to the suffering soul—
Here in the sunlight, yet undimmed by shade,
I cry for aid.

I dare not lightly drain the cup of pleasure,
Though Thine the hand that proffers me the draught;
Such bitter lees lie lower in the measure
I shall need courage ere the portion's quaffed;
Then strengthen me, before that time befall,
To drink the gall.

I need Thee in my joys and my successes,
To make me humbly grateful and not vain;
I need Thee when the weight of sorrow presses
The tortured heart that cries aloud in pain;
So close great pleasure and great anguish lie—
O God, come nigh!

NOTES ON ANASTASIS.—NO. 9.

Eccl. iii. 17, I said in mine heart God shall judge the righteous and the wicked; for there is a time for every matter and for every work. In the preceding verse of this chapter it will be seen that Solomon is extolling the wisdom of God, and also his all-comprehending goodness, and in the text quoted he concedes to him the right of judgment. 1 Tim. iii. 16, And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness; he who was manifested in the flesh, justified in the spirit, seen of angels, preached among the nations, believed on in the world, received up into glory (the word God, in place of he who, rests on no sufficient ancient evidence; some ancient authorities read which).

This text is referred to to try to prove that the Almighty Father and his only begotten Son are one being, manifested in the flesh. This also is a most unscriptural and absurd theory, to disprove which we cannot now turn aside. I will ask every intelligent reader to search the word and see if we are there taught that the Father and Son are one, and that they are justified by the Spirit. Is not this the most complicated Trinitarianism? John v. 22–27, For neither doth the Father judge any man, but hath given all judgment unto the Son; that all men might honor the Son even as they honor the Father. For as the Father hath life in himself, even so gave he to the Son to have life in himself; and he gave him authority to execute judgment, because he is a Son of man.

From these texts and their contexts we learn that the Father has given unto the Son life eternal; not only for himself but also the power to bestow that eternal life upon all whom he may judge or find worthy of that life. Hence it is that all who have done good or evil shall hear his voice and come forth from their tombs. First they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and second they that have done evil unto the resurrection of judgment. (Note. It is contended that John v. 28, "Marvel not at this, for the hour cometh in which all that are in their tombs shall hear his voice, etc.," refers to a limited period and that it cannot therefore include a thousand years. But if we look at John iv. 23 we will find the same language used, when we must admit that the "hour" there mentioned has already covered more than eighteen hundred years. "But the hour cometh and now is when the true worshippers shall worship the Father, etc." We all must admit that the hour here referred to covers the time then being measured as well as the present, and at least what may follow in the present dispensation. Why then should John v. 28 be taken in so limited a sense?)

John xii. 48, He that rejecteth me and receiveth not my sayings hath one that judgeth him. The word that I spoke, the same shall judge him in the last day. The text agrees with all other Scriptures bearing on this point, that our final acceptance unto life or condemnation unto death, will depend on whether we hear, receive and practice the word of life or whether we reject it. And these facts will be manifested by our being called forth to the resurrection unto life, or in the resurrection unto condemnation. Psa. xxvii. 33, The Lord will not leave him in his hand nor condemn him when he is judged. By reading verse 32 we get at the true import of vers 33; 32, "The wicked watcheth the righteous and seeketh to slay him;" 33, "The Lord will not leave him in his hands nor condemn him when he is judged." Surely a babe in Christ can see that it is here taught that the wicked judgeth the righteous worthy of death, but the Lord who knoweth all things will not sustain their judgment nor condemn the righteous to death according to their enemies' judgment. This text has no reference at all to the question in hand. Eccl. xii. 14, For God shall bring every work into judgment concerning every hidden thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil. In this Eccl. or the Preacher, we find many words of wisdom; especially does he endeavor to show the littleness of all humanity, of all ambition and all knowledge that pertaineth not to God; and in verse 8 he sums all up as "vanity of vanities." Then in verse 13 he retrospects a little and readjusts the whole matter thus: "This is the end of the whole matter, all hath been heard; fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man." Then comes verse 14, based on what precedes it. For God shall bring every work into judgment concerning every hidden thing whether it be good or whether it be evil. One shade of meaning represented by the word judge is, "to hear and determine by authority." It seems very evident that this is its signification in this text. God is represented as having authority over all things and he will determine or pass judgment without the aid of mortals.

Matt. xii. 36, 37, And I say unto you that every idle word that man shall speak he shall give an account thereof in the day of judgment; for by thy words thou shalt be justified, or by thy words thou shalt be condemned. In the preceding verses the Master has been endeavoring to show to his hearers the importance of words, how that a word spoken against the Son of Man might be forgiven, but a word spoken against the Spirit would not be forgiven, either in this age or that which is to come. In verse 34 he says, Offspring of vipers, how can ye, being evil speak good things, for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. The good man out of his good treasure bringeth forth good things; and the evil man out of his evil treasure bringeth forth evil things. Then follows the quoted text which we must take as meaning that according to the character formed, whether good or evil, so shall our reward or punishment be. We cannot for a moment suppose that this language is to be taken in the precise sense of the words in which it is expressed, and that every individual will actually give account of every idle word they have spoken, all through sometimes very long and illy spent lives. Such a thought is but a forced caricature of God's divine and infinitely wise purpose toward our race.

Rom. ii. 5, 12, 16. But after thy hardness and impenitent heart treasurest up unto thyself wrath in the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to every man according to his works; to them that by patience in well doing seek for glory and honor and incorruption, eternal life, but unto them that are factious and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that worketh evil, of the Jew first and also of the Greek. But glory, honor and peace to every man that worketh good, to the Jew first and also to the Greek, for there is no respect of persons with God. For as many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law; and as many as have sinned under law shall be judged by law; for not the hearers of a law are accounted righteous before God, but the doers of a law shall be judged righteous in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men according to my gospel by Jesus Christ.

Neither in this quotation, nor yet in one of the texts given, is there the slightest proof of "mortal emergence," or that man shall in mortal body stand before the tribunal of Christ and tell the story of his life. Dear readers I earnestly beseech you not to close your hearts and eyes against the everlasting truth as revealed unto us by the great Jehovah. Search the Scriptures for yourselves. The truths by which both you and I will yet be judged are there made plain. Let no man (or woman) deceive you through vain philosophy. Hold up their sayings to the light of the life-giving word, and if they blend not in sublime harmony with what is therein revealed, believe them not. Cast them off as an useless thing before the great test day dawn upon you, for then it will be all too late to adjust our building, and if the wood, hay and stubble has been our material, accepted and persistently and blindly used, the loss will be one, and oh, how great!

But I must continue this task and further quote from Anastasis. "No speaking can be plainer than this. There is a day styled the last day, which is a day of judgment, specified by John as the time of the dead that they should be judged. In that day a great white throne is set, and the dead, small and great, stand before Deity sitting thereon; certain books are then opened and the dead are judged out of the things that are written in the books, according to their works. Rev. xx. 11–15. This judicial throne is what Paul terms in Rom. xiv. 10 and 2 Cor. v. 10 the judgment seat of Christ, and in writing to the saints he says we must all appear and stand before it."

These texts in Rev., Rom. and 2 Cor. are quoted, but there is no proof offered that they refer to the first resurrection. As in previous cases, there is none to offer. That Christ will come and take away his saints from the earth before the judgments written are poured out upon an ungodly world, we have very pointed clear evidence in the word of life. The prophets foretold it, the Master himself taught it, the angels who appeared to his followers at the ascension taught it, and so also did the apostles.

In Matt. xxiv. the Master is speaking to the people in parables about the coming of the Son of Man and says it shall be in his day as it was in the days of Noah. The busy world knew not what was pending over the earth till the flood came and took them all away. Yet Noah and his family were safely resting in the ark. Having obeyed the voice of God and laid the sure foundation they entered into its chambers ere the judgments were poured out, and as it was in the days of Noah so also shall it be in the days of the Son of man.

Again he says of the coming time, Two shall be in the field, the one shall be taken and the other left; two women shall be grinding at a mill, one is taken and one is left. Watch, therefore, for ye know not on what day your Lord cometh. In Luke xvii. the same lesson is recorded, and the disciples said, Where Lord? and he said wheresoever the body is, there will the eagles be gathered together. Showing that the wheresabouts of the saints would be known to the Lord, and from thence he would call them. In the first chapter of Acts Luke testifies as to how the Christ was taken up from the Mount of Olives and says, And when he had spoken these words, while they beheld, he was taken up and a cloud received him out of their sight. And while they looked steadfastly as he went up, behold two men stood by them in white apparel which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus whom ye have seen go into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven. Query. How did he go into heaven? Ans. Just as the thief comes, silently, suddenly, unobserved by the busy world. He himself said, Behold I come as a thief. Those who were in fellowship with him saw him arise. So also those who are in fellowship with him will see him descend. His call to and for his chosen ones will not be heard by the worldly wise, the vast multitude who look not for his appearing. He will come as a thief to take the choicest treasures of the house for his own benefit and pleasure.

Yes, so will our dear Savior return for his saints, and they will all, both those who are watching and waiting and those who have long been sleeping in the dust of sheol, ascend to "meet the Lord in the air." 1 Thess. iv. 14–18. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again even so them also that are fallen asleep will God, through Jesus, bring with him. For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord; that we that are alive and that are left unto the coming of the Lord, shall in no wise precede them that are fallen asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive that are left shall, together with them, be caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord. 1 Thess. v. 1, 2, But concerning the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you, for yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night. When they are saying peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them and they shall in no wise escape. 1 Cor. xv. 52, We all shall not sleep but we all shall be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump. For the trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised incorruptible and we shall be changed.

In all these texts we are plainly told of the resurrection of the sleeping saints, the change from mortality to immortality of the then living saints, and the translation of all to meet the Lord in the air, but there is nothing said of the resurrection of the just or the unjust. It is in the assembling of the nations, not either resurrected saints or sinners that is here spoken of. Christ, the rightful heir of all things, having descended to the earth, and claimed the kingdom as his own, and doomed all of earth's nations to everlasting punishment, or restraint, as is the true import of the word, for henceforth he will be king over all the earth, there will be one Lord and his name One. He then turns to those on his right hand as well as good men, and to them he says, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." Yes, we were chosen in him before the foundation of the world. Eph. i. 4. And when he has descended from his Father's throne and assembled all nations before him for righteous judgment, he will address these chosen ones and invite them to come and share with him the glories of that kingdom.

NOTICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS:

The book is truthful, forcible and instructive, every way worthy of the attention of those who prefer calm arguments to sensational speculation.—The Rainbow.

We are desirous to express our sympathy with the general scope of the book, and to bespeak for it a wide and candid perusal.—The Messenger.

The volume before us is evidently the product of a thoughtful mind, and deserves the careful study of every Christian, being of a very comprehensive character, and based on Scripture. Certainly it is the best work on its subject which has come under our notice.—The Sydney Observer.

The treatment shows that the author has studied well and patiently discussed his theme before writing upon it, and as far as we read page after page, stimulated rather than clogged in our inquiry.....The plan of the volume before us is to set the truth clearly before the mind, and so restore to it its place in the consciousness of the [illegible] that may once so dear to God's people, and [illegible] God is still so to many, but [illegible] carelessness to a wealthy, self-satisfied [illegible] hated by the world. ## THE COMING AGE,

—ITS—

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WESTBEE.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence, it treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar terms, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the will of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXV. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, MAY 20, 1886. NO. 20.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the Scriptural restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Selections.

THE CROSS AND THE CROWN.

"It is a faithful saying: For if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him: if we suffer, we shall also reign with him: if we deny him, he also will deny us." 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12.

These are some of the laws of compensation which regulate human as well as divine procedure. The distinction is this, however, that whereas human character is fickle and full of caprices, so that many a time faithful service goes unrewarded, that can never happen in the case of service rendered to the One who is faithful, who "cannot deny himself." In that case we can be sure of the result, for "if we suffer (with him or in his cause), we shall also reign with him." Hear it joyfully, O! all ye sorrowing, suffering hearts, whose burdens are heavy, whose way is beset with dark clouds, and whose future looms ominously, fraught with coming storm and trouble. Lift up your heads, O Christian pilgrims, and pluck up heart to look beyond the vale of tears, past all the suffering and sorrow of the present time, to the bright and abiding joy of that reign in glory with your Lord and Savior.

"Brief life is here our portion,
Brief sorrow, short-lived care;
The life that knows no ending,
The tearless life is there.
O! happy retribution,
Short toil, eternal rest,
For mortals and for sinners,
A portion truly blest."

Can there be no mistake about this future? No: none whatever. If we fail to attain to that haven of rest, it will be our own fault, [illegible] possibility. [illegible]ture: we will rather seek to strengthen one another's faith, so that we may endure as good soldiers of the Cross and make our title to the [illegible] and solid.

[illegible] Peter, unto you. But rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that, when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy." 1 Peter iv. 12, 13. Here we have a good starting-point, for the ground of our hope for future glory is participation in the sufferings of Christ. Nothing more is asked from us in this matter than what our blessed Master has gone through; nay, not nearly so much, for his was a spotless life, untainted with sin, not worthy of death; ours is a contaminated, sinful life, worthy of death. Let us consider first what the Scriptures have to teach about the Cross and the Crown in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ.

We use the word "Cross" in the general sense of a burden, or suffering; just as Jesus used it saying: "He that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me." Now, our Lord's whole public life was one of cross-bearing; it was full of privation, sorrow and suffering, and with a nature so overflowing with love, how keenly susceptible of all pain he must have been!

How much suffering he endured for others! He could not come into the presence of suffering without every fibre of his own kindly nature throbbing in sympathy. "There came a leper to him, beseeching him, and kneeling down to him, and saying unto him, 'If thou wilt, thou canst make me clean.' And Jesus, moved with compassion, put forth his hand, and touched him, and saith unto him, 'I will, be thou clean.'" "When he saw the multitudes, he was moved with compassion on them, because they fainted and were scattered abroad, as sheep having no shepherd." "When he came nigh to the gate of the city (Nain), behold, there was a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow.....And when the Lord saw her, he had compassion on her, and said unto her, weep not. And he came and touched the bier; and the bearers stood still. And he said, Young man, I say unto thee, Arise." Once again in presence of the distress and mourning which always accompany death, we read, "When Jesus therefore saw her weeping, and the Jews also weeping which came with her, he groaned in the spirit and was troubled.....Jesus wept." Of a truth "He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows;"

"In every pang that rends the heart,
The Man of Sorrows had a part."

Whilst thus bearing the griefs of others he had his own full share of sorrow. "Foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head." This was the fate of the Nazarene—"despised and rejected of men." How often had he to bear the insults and jeers of the rulers of the people, and was laid in wait for with murderous purpose, so that he was driven from place to place, and had at times to hide himself from their intended violence. But the climax came at last. When his time was come to be delivered into their hands—"then did they spit in his face, and buffeted him; and others smote him with the palms of their hands, saying, Prophesy unto us, thou Christ.—Who is he that smote thee?" In mockery of his claims to be their King, they put on him a crown of thorns; then, after a mock trial and condemnation, they caused him to carry his own cross towards Calvary's heights, toiling along the pathway of deep humiliation and lonely suffering, forsaken by all friends; in his end, ranked with sinners, and reviled even by his fellow-sufferers. Then think of his cruel death by crucifixion! Ah! how sore were his trials in that moment we can only guess by the anticipatory agony in Gethsemane, and his thrice repeated earnest prayer: "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup [illegible] from me."

[illegible] all this suffering? He was innocent, and died not for his own sins, but "the just for the unjust;" it was the "chastisement of our peace" that was laid upon him, and therefore we are the gainers. But still—why the suffering? Some difficult questions come in the train of that one, but let us try to dispose of some of them, and first consider what the Scriptures do teach about this suffering and death of Christ.

They do not teach that Christ's [illegible] was the equivalent of the eternal suffering and torments of millions of God's creatures. Neither do they teach that the sacrifice of Christ was to appease the wrath of God, as of some inveterate enemy of mankind, Christ having to step in between the poor sinner and a fierce, unlovable God, who required this to be reconciled to the sinner. No; these teachings mar the doctrine of the Atonement, and cause men to forget that it was God who "so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life;" and that Christ's work of reconciliation is reconciling sinners to God. Since the world began and sin entered into it, forfeiture of life has been the recognized penalty of sin, which fact is taught in all the sacrifices of the Mosaic economy, as well as that that means, viz., the giving up of one life for another—was God's appointed way of forgiveness. Do you ask—wherefore? It is no matter. It is sufficient for us that it was necessary in the divine purpose, for the Lord Jesus has taught us so himself:—"Ought not he suffer many things and be ejected of this generation." Luke xvii. 25; "Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day." Luke xxiv. 46

It is much more important for us to notice the purpose of Christ's suffering and death:—"that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem." Luke xxiv. 47. That is one main purpose of Christ's suffering and death, where the effects concern ourselves intimately; but we are presently considering the result as regards the Lord Jesus himself. Look, therefore, at Heb. ii. 9, 10:—"We see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor; that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man. For it became him, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings." The double purpose—the link that unites our destiny to his—is here very clearly stated. He (Jesus) was made perfect through sufferings, in order that through him God might "bring many sons unto glory;" he has gone over all the road we must traverse if we would follow his lead; he has overcome all its difficulties, and knowing the rough places, he stands ready to assist us at every difficult turning. Yea, even in the darkest hour of trial, when death's deep shadow engulphs us, we can feel strength in the knowledge that he also vanquished this greatest of enemies, for "being made perfect he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him."

For all the suffering which he endured, Jesus has been "crowned with glory and honor," for now he is set down at the Father's right hand, sharing the honors of the Father's throne, and enjoying the glory which he had with the Father before the world was. There, in the realms of highest bliss and purest light, amidst the angelic hosts whose obedience is perfect, at the Father's right hand where there is "fulness of joy," and "pleasures for evermore;" surely there is every reason to believe that the Lord Jesus must be satisfied, and could wish for no more. Yes, had his suffering been borne for his own sake—to gain his own ends merely—we might say no; but the Lord Jesus is not satisfied, for his work was not for himself, and it is not yet finished. Nay, he is waiting for the time when he shall leave the Father's right hand again, and come with great power and glory to redeem those who by faith in his name have had all their sins forgiven and become joint-heirs with him of glory. "O sinner, believe it; Christ hath redeemed us once for all." All of faith are his crown of rejoicing in that day when he shall take them from the power of death and fashion them like unto his own glorious body, when "he shall see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied." He is waiting for you and for me, dear reader, to open unto him that he may share with us his joy; and such is the perfect accord that reigns amongst the heavenly hosts, that, in anticipation of the glory to be revealed in us, "there is joy in the presence of the angels over one sinner that repenteth."

"Knocking, knocking, who is there?
Waiting, waiting, Oh, how late!
'Tis a pilgrim strange and kingly,
Never such was seen before;
Ah! my soul, for such a welcome,
Will thou not unto the door?"

Let us consider that we have undone the door and freely given our Lord a lodgment in our hearts; there to reign supreme, for he is the Master, and we are the disciples. Has Christ's suffering and death freed his disciples from the necessity of undergoing the same? By no means. The disciple's lot is in every respect a counterpart of his Master's; he has to follow on in the same course.

"Lead, kindly Light, amid th' encircling gloom, Lead Thou me on."

"It is a faithful saying—If we be dead with him, we shall also live with him; if we suffer, we shall also reign with him." But the converse of this will also hold true, viz.: "If we would live with him we must also die with him; if we would reign with him, we must also suffer." For there is a lawful way of attaining to these honors and blessings. "Then, therefore, endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of this life, that he may please him who hath chosen him to be a soldier. And if a man also strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully. The husbandman that laboreth must be first partaker of the fruits." 2 Tim. ii. 3–6. The lawful way of striving for the incorruptible crown is to pass through the prior self-denial and suffering. Thus Paul says, "I am crucified with Christ." "They that are Christ's, have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts." "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, whereby the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world." Gal. ii. 20, 21; vi. 14.

To succeed in this self-denial, in this giving up of the world, is not to be reckoned as an easy task. It is an exceedingly difficult task to most, if not to all. But this is what our Lord enjoins. "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me. And he that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me. He that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." Matt. x. 37–39. On another occasion when Peter had rebuked his Master for speaking of his own suffering and death, the Lord rebuked him saying, "Thou art an offence unto me; for thou savorest not of the things that be of God, but those that be of men.....If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me." Matt. xvi. 23, 24. These passages do not teach that we are not to have natural affection, and love our father, mother, and children; but before that and every other duty, implicit obedience to Christ must have the first place, let the consequences be what they may. It was in this way, irrespective of consequences, that Jesus rendered a perfect obedience to his Father.

As it is made plain that the disciple's course of suffering is a counterpart of his Master's, so also is his reward the same. "He is faithful that promised." As a natural outcome of our Lord's injunctions, Peter said to him, "Lo, we have left all, and have followed thee. And Jesus answered, Verily, I say unto you, there is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my sake, and the gospel's, but he shall receive an hundredfold now in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with persecutions; and in the world to come eternal life." Mark x. 28–30. Many a Christian has experienced the truth of our Lord's words in this life, for when natural parents and family relations have shut the door upon them, hundreds of other doors have been opened for them amidst their tribulations, for the sake and name of Christ; so surely shall the latter part of the promise be fulfilled also—"in the world to come eternal life." This is the "incorruptible crown" for which we strive. "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him." James i. 12. "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life." Rev. ii. 10. It is real life, and not symbolical happiness, that is promised; it is the compensation for losing one's life in the present time for the sake of Christ; being "faithful unto death," the disciple finds his life again in the resurrection, and no man can nay more take it from him: "he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal."

Glory and honor are associated with this "crown of life," and so we read, "When the Chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away." 1 Peter v. 4. Paul also speaks of the "crown of righteousness" which the Lord shall give him "in that day," and to "all them also that love his appearing."

Once more the disciple's destiny is shaped by that of his Master. The Lord Jesus in reward for his obedience was set down with his Father in his throne. But he shall yet wear the royal diadem which is his own by right, when he comes back to reign in Mount Zion and Jerusalem gloriously, and it shall be proclaimed by great voices in heaven that "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever." So the Lord has promised to share the honors even of this regal crown with his faithful disciples. "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne." Rev. iii. 21. When we consider our own unworthiness of such exceeding riches of grace toward us, our hearts can with fervor join in the doxology of the apostle John:—"Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen."

Finally, if we calculate the cost of the sacrifice that is asked of us for Christ's sake, or weigh the losses in the balance with the gains, can there be any doubt as to what we shall choose? Shall we save our life now, and lose it in the future and for ever? Shall we set our affections upon things seen, but temporal? or upon things unseen as yet, but which we know by faith to exist, and which are eternal? Shall we shrink from the afflictions of the present life, which Paul, who suffered much, could yet esteem as light afflictions, and but for a moment? or shall we esteem it better to endure them and wait with patience for the eternal weight of glory which shall assuredly be ours if we remain faithful unto him who has already conquered for us? Courage! brother, choose now your eternal welfare, and "cast not away your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward."

"And now we fight the battle,
But then shall wear the crown
Of full and everlasting
And jubilant renown.
Strive, war, for who that glory,
Such hosts, to gain that light;
Send hope before to grasp it,
Till hope be lost in sight."

GOD SPEAKS.

"See that ye refuse not him that speaketh. for if they escaped not who refused him who spake on earth, much more shall not we escape if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven." Heb. xii. 25.

This statement brought the Hebrew believers and unbelievers, into the presence of the speaker, and shows that he had the right to command obedience, and inflict punishment upon the disobedient. He speaks from the heavens. The speaker is Jehovah, and he speaks of his own immovable kingdom to which he was inviting men to become heirs with a view to inheritance on a future day, when he will remove from off the earth the present kingdoms called the kingdoms of this world. Israel, or the Hebrews, were the children of Jehovah's kingdom, but in a state of disobedience, or of unbelief in Jehovah having spoken unto them by his Son. Their rejection of Jehovah's messenger, of necessity was the rejection of the message, and placed the children of Jehovah in danger of being cast off by him, and also of being subjected to punishment for their rebellion, hence the apostolic warning "See that ye refuse not him that speaketh from heaven."

It is of the utmost importance that we discern the immediate medium adopted by Jehovah. He spake on earth, and only those who rejected Moses, the person through whom he spake, rejected Jehovah the speaker, and not Moses simply. He spake in these last days by John the son of Zacharias. The Scribes and Pharisees rejected John and said he had a demon. They repented not of this act although they knew that he was the messenger of Jehovah. It pleased Jehovah to speak to them after John was imprisoned, by his beloved Son, but the Son of Jehovah shared no better than his forerunner John. They rejected him under the charge of being gluttonous, a wine bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners. Men never act without having a reason for their action. Almost if not always, the disobedient give a false reason for their behavior. It is so with all who refuse to hear Jehovah, or any one whom they judge has come from him. The first act of refusal may be in appearance, a very unimportant matter, and it at the same time may lead to public overt denial at last. Sin or disobedience is deceitful. Men are deceived by it and entrapped into its power before they know it. The history of man from the first may be described as the history of deception, disobedience and death. Speech implies that the listener has two courses open before him. The object of every speaker is to produce a decision in favor of what he says. This always has been and always must be the aim of Jehovah. The consciousness that he has the absolute right not simply to speak to man, but also the absolute right to punish the refusers to hear him lies embedded in every man's being. The refuser, therefore, carries with him through life the record of his refusals, be they one or many. They form the gulf fixed by himself between him and the speaker. Each single act of disobedience, making the distance further apart. The relationship between speaker and hearer is not that of one well disposed friend towards another, whose kind offices could be refused and no breach of friendship follow. It is rather that of Creator and his intelligent creature whose creation is only partially accomplished. A step towards his creation in the image of God has already been reached by the goodwill of the Creator over which the creature had no control. Now a step has been reached and he is consulted, as apart from his decision and action no further progress can be made. Before reason can be appealed to reason must exist. And before reason can exist it must first be created.

In the passage under consideration, reason is appealed to for a decision; "See that ye refuse not him that speaks" as if you do there is no possibility of your escaping the condemnation of the speaker.

What then does the authoritative speaker, who is able to kill and who is able to make alive, say to his creature and call upon him to view of life or death, to give heed to? It is a question whose answer involves life if obeyed, and death if disobeyed, and must be listened to with one of these issues resulting from the attention given.

The hearer is already in possession of life by the power of the speaker. He is also under condemnation to lose the life he now has, because of disobedience which he has already practiced. The hearer is already under sin. His days are already determined. The speaker therefore can speak to his sinful condemned creature of two things only. These are of the removal of his sins [illegible] thereof, before his condition [illegible] changed. The speaker's message [illegible] the self-convicted perishing man, [illegible] one of favor, of forgiveness, and of life. He therefore who refuses to hear [illegible] spises the voice of favor, forgiveness and life. The despiser, therefore, deprives himself of the favor which the speaker has brought to his ears. It is foolish for any one to suppose, or to deceive himself that he can have the favor of his Creator and at the same time despise that favor. It is surely an insane thought for one to destroy his own life, and at the same time seek to retain it.

[illegible] earth, much more shall not we escape if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven, whose voice then shook the earth: but now he hath promised saying, Yet once more I spake, not the earth only but also heaven."

There is no life for the sinful one, who remains in the practice of his sins. The speaker will by no means clear the guilty one, who continues his practices. The conditions of settlement made known by the favor of the speaker are "Repentance towards himself" against whom the sin was committed. This means nothing short of an absolute surrender by casting off the practice of sin or disobedience. This is most reasonable as no king or sovereign would think of extending his favor to a rebellious subject who came into his presence with his weapons of rebellion bristling upon him. No, these one and all must be cast down. "Faith towards the Lord Jesus Christ." This recognises that the Lord Jesus Christ is the Son of the Sovereign who is the speaker; as any hesitation upon this matter is evidence in itself that the hesitator is still doubtful of the favor of the speaker. The Lord Jesus Christ the Son of the Sovereign, was brought into the situation of Mediator by the favor of the Sovereign. For any one to fail to recognize his relationship to the Sovereign is to fail to discern the Sovereign's favor. The Mediator cannot at the same time be the Sovereign, while he is the way leading to the Sovereign. The winding stream which courses the mountainsides down to the plains below is not the fountain lake or source from whence it flows. It is the stream, while the fountain is the cause of its existence.

The favor of the Sovereign, the fountain of life, is the generating power out of which all favor comes. This generative power, favor, generated the Lord Jesus, who at the same time was the channel through which the Sovereign's favor was made visible to those in a state of rebellion. To make more visible, therefore the Sovereign's favor, the Lord Jesus Christ his own Son suffered the death due to a rebel against divine and human authority, although neither of these authorities found any cause of death against him.

Faith towards the Lord Jesus Christ therefore embraces the motives of the Sovereign for giving him existence, and then giving him up to the power of mankind to put him to death. The raising of him from the dead and his exaltation to the right hand of God, to give repentance and remission of sins to all in every nation who come unto God by him. Reconciliation to all who are in rebellion forms the grand theme of the divine discourse. Repentance for past disobediences manifested by turning from them, and a hearty recognition of God's favor commended towards us in that while we were in open rebellion Christ died for us. These parts of the heavenly speech stand at the threshold of reconciliation. If there be no hearty turning from the acts of disobedience there can be no repentance toward God. And if the love of God manifested in giving up of his Son to die for our sins have no power to draw us to himself in true devotion, no reconciliation has been effected. If the love of Christ as demonstrated by giving himself for us have no power to generate in us love to him, then so far as we are concerned we are unreconciled.

If therefore reconciliation to the divine speaker be not effected, by our refusal, it is manifest that nothing else is left for him to do than to destroy us from his presence, by any means he pleases.

Rebellion cannot become the rule as that would end in violence. Long and oft repeated invitations to repentance and reconciliation have been made by the Almighty Sovereign Ruler of men; but these only prove that refusal will be visited with permanent con[illegible] one who despises [illegible] therefore to the [illegible] pentant: "[illegible] and when [illegible] was re[illegible]

SUN SPOTS AND THE STORMS.

An eruption upon the sun was in progress during the severe storms in Kansas, Missouri and other Western States Tuesday. An observation of the sun Tuesday revealed no spots, except the great group which was well advanced toward the western limb and was going out of sight on Wednesday. An observation on Wednesday, however, showed that new spots had formed a little to the east of the meridian. Two of them were defined and others could be seen at intervals. When first observed there was a thin haze in the atmosphere which allowed good definition, but cut off a great deal of light. By the aid of this haze scarlet vapor could be seen rising from the disturbed region and floating northward over the sun's disc. One of these scarlet clouds was traced for a considerable distance, the contrast of colors being very plain. After the haze was dissipated the scarlet flames could not be seen. This indicated that the eruptions were still proceeding. This is further evidenced by the rose-colored light in the sky after sunset last evening. The barometer also fell quite rapidly yesterday (Wednesday) over Minnesota and the upper lakes, and was falling a little at nearly all the stations. This solar activity will bring warmer weather for a time, probably extending to the warm period due about the middle of May. A brief spell of cooler weather may, however, intervene for a day. The eruptions of Tuesday produced results which were often noticed during 1884 and 1885. The effects are immediate upon our atmosphere. They cannot be foretold because the evidence does not appear until after the spots form. In case of a return of solar disturbances by the sun's rotation the case is different.—Rochester Democrat.

A BAPTISMAL SCENE.

On Monday last between 4 and 5 p. m., it was our privilege to baptize four persons into the Divine name, and thus bring them into that wonderful relationship to God and his dear Son as to constitute them children of God—a paternity after which "the whole family in heaven and earth is named." Eph. iii. 15. One of the remote or head tributaries of the great Mississippi — meaning in the aboriginal tongue of the Red Man, Father-of-floods—flows through Plymouth. The aboriginal name of this distant branch of one of the grandest rivers in the world was Wathcongau, signifying turbid, or colored water. Its name in the English language very nearly conforms to the name given by the vanished race in signification — being Yellow River. On the bank of this stream, swollen and more deeply colored by recent rains, the little Plymouth church and some interested spectators assembled, and one by one the candidates were led down into the flowing stream and placed in the watery grave, and from that symbolic burial raised up to walk, as we hope and trust, in the new life. To share in the eternal life to be given through the resurrection from the dead, as the gift of God through his dear Son, and the honors and glories of God's everlasting kingdom, was the faith and hope into which these believers in Christ and his gospel were baptized.

From one of our sisters [illegible] then baptized, her [illegible] taken away by [illegible] pain's bitter [illegible] picture, as painted on the canvas of time, had thus its lights and its shadowings. It is ever so in this world. We follow in the foot-steps of the "Man of Sorrows." The shadings of grief darkened the whole picture of his life. But let not our hearts be troubled. The narrow pathway through the vale of tears has its outcome in the eternal summer lands of the Paradise of God. What if the poet's words be true to the letter,

"The path of sorrow and that path alone Leads to the land where sorrow is unknown."

Shall we not cheerfully take it? If it be through the deserts here it will finally usher us into the exceeding great and eternal weight of glory in the "sweet by and by." May the newly adopted ones into the Divine family on earth prove faithful and so attain the glories reserved for the first-born ones from the grave.

THE ORIENT.

The Evening Journal comments on Eastern affairs in the Editorial note appended. Whether the oft-gathering clouds will disperse into a temporary sunshine of peace, or thicken into a continental tempest of war, time alone can decide. There is a destiny that shapes the ends of all human affairs.

"The situation in Greece is peculiar. The new Cabinet is a body of peace-at-any-price men. A general disarmament and disbandment of the Greek armies has been ordered. But at the seat of war the greatest activity prevails. There is fighting along the entire line every day, and reports of the killed, wounded and missing are regularly sent from both sides.

How long such a state of affairs can last is not much of a problem. Either the Cabinet will have to stop talking peace, or the army will have to stop fighting in a very short time. The acts of a nation, like those of an individual, speak louder than words. At present it looks very much as if the army were inspired by the counsels of a great power like Russia that wants war, and that it will carry the day in spite of the peace Cabinet."

From the same Journal we give another Editorial brevity on the latter day scourge of nations. In the last day calamities the pestilence will walk in darkness and destruction will waste at noon-day. The mocker may mock and the scoffer may scoff, but a day of untold tribulation is at hand.

"During two seasons it has been expected that the cholera would make its appearance in the United States. The outbreak of the plague in France and Italy in 1884 occurred late in the season, and the apprehension that it would cross the Atlantic was less vivid than in 1885, when it became active at an earlier in the year.

The disease has already broken out in some of the seaports of France, and is making startling headway. This is early in the season for its appearance. July, August and September, but more particularly the latter two, are the months in which its greatest ravages occur.

As cholera has broken out so early in Europe, the danger is so much greater that it will be brought across the ocean by midsummer or a little later. We should be prepared for it."

BROTHER WEETHEE'S BOOK.

Bro. Bond writes from Washington—"Words fitly spoken are like apples of gold in pictures of silver." The more I read Bro. Weethee's book—The Coming Age—the more I am enlightened. It is a peculiar [illegible] knowledge. I have read it three times, and the more I read it the better I like it, and the wiser I am. Every Bible Student should have a copy.

To this testimonial we can add that the Coming Age, as a book, is well worthy of all the commendation bestowed upon it. It is a work of great research, and an invaluable aid in the study of prophecy.

The Names of the Twelve Patriarchs as Signs Indicative of their Generic Character and Other Providential Teaching.

The names of "The Twelve Patriarchs" in the order of their birth, but not in the order of their generic horoscope as given in the 49th chapter of Genesis and commonly known as "Jacob's Blessing," is as follows: Hrouben, Symeon, Levei, Joudas, Zeboulon, Issachar, Dan, Gad, Aser, Nephthali, Joseph, Benjamin. This is the order of their birth, be it remembered; and the student of prophecy will observe a correction between the events [illegible] their birth, as given in the [illegible], 30th and 35th chapters of Genesis and this divine horoscope of their nature as given the 49th chapter.

The name given at the child's birth is the germ in each instance of the stellar prophecy of their father Jacob's closing horoscope. The amazing corruption of the prophetic Scriptural names has made it an almost impossible task to work out these great and truly wonderful problems of divine revelation, and the writer would not speak with absolute assurance on all the points of interpretation which he brings forward; and first Hrouben or Pouqtry, "I was red" (with shame); see context, Gen. xxix. 32, where it says his mother so named him, "Because the Lord saw my humiliation and gave me a son." Derivation Pouq—an old root common to many of the Eastern languages, from which we get ruby, a precious stone, so called because of its beautiful red color. See Rufus in the Latin, Routh "The Blushing One." "Rus" as a botanical term to distinguish the red color of the sumach, etc., —ry the imperfect, first person, singular of the verb eqat to be translated "I was." See Gen. xlix. 3, 4 for the horoscope of the shame and humiliation of reckless haste.

Symeon (or Symeon) ou, preposition meaning with; ne, objective case, singular of the first personal pronoun meaning me, eou, the first person, nominative case of the present participle of eqat, to be the; term by which God first revealed himself to Habraam, "The one who is" or "The Being." Whole interpretation, "The one who is with me," a recognition or confession of God's providential agency in this matter.

Levei (or Leoui) "A son of strong desire." See context, Gen. xxix. 34, "And she said, at this time now my husband will be on my side, for I have borne him three sons; therefore she called his name Levei." Interpretation: le or li, root of an old Syrian obsolete verb, appearing only in the present tense in some of the oldest Greek writers, but entering into many compounds as an intensive generally in its effect; v, root of the word ouoq, moaning son, and cognate with the old Sanscript su, having the same signification, and ei, third person singular of the verb eqat "to be." See Gen. xlix. 5-8 for the horoscope of these two.

Joudas (or Joudaec) ou, interjection emotional of sorrow, "lo;" da, the root of the old and obsolete daw, a word kindred in its root to daow, the first meaning "to teach," the second to distribute or apportion, as doth the master of a feast. The same root appears in the name David, which means, "taught to know." The one who is thus taught becomes in parable language a person meet to divide the word "meat indeed," "in due season." He is also "a divider of the spoil with the strong" in the character of "the Lion of the tribe of Jouda." The reader will see from the above the seed prophecy I think in the name Joudas. Whole interpretation, "Lo, the teacher" or "the divider of portions." See Jacob's horoscopic blessing, Gen. xlix. 8-12 for the full development of this seed prophecy. Joudas, moreover, was to be "the leader" of his brethren and [illegible] of Jouda was to be the leader of the [illegible] tribes. This leadership asserted in David and fully asserted in "The Christ," toward which assertion all these prophecies point.

Dan (or Jan) root of Daow, a loan on interest, sometimes a gift, primitive signification, however, a loan. The general teaching here of man's trusteeship in his relation to God, so beautifully and emphatically taught in the parable of the "talents." There always comes a day of judgment on a loan, a reckoning day. See Jacob's horoscope in regard to Dan. Gen. xlix. 16. "Dan shall judge his royal people as though he also were one tribe in Israel." God has not lost sight of Dan though the church and the world have.

Nephthali (or Nq, naiel), eqyrs, a cloud; root eqy, derived meaning, a throng of people; Saiel, root of Saiiw, to bloom, sprout, shoot out, swell, abound, flourish, prosper; ei, a particle here expressive of a wish or prayer like the Latin utinam, signification "would that" or possibly the appropriate form of the verb "to be." Whole interpretation, "May he be a swelling cloud." See amplification of this seed-word prophecy in Jacob's horoscope, Gen. xlix. 21. "Nephthalsi is a shoot from a root that abideth yielding beauty in its product."

Gad (or Jad) yuda root yad, a Persian word in its derivation, meaning the royal treasury, derivitively, however, any treasure or riches in general. Interpretation "riches" or "royal riches" or "the riches of the king." See development of this seed-word prophecy in Jacob's horoscopic blessing, Gen. xlix. 19.

Gad, piracy will rob him, but he will rob it to his best (that is, utterly humble it).

Aser (or Aeqr) aesq, satiety from aw, to satisfy, and eq root. Whole meaning "a root of satiety" or perhaps merely "satiety." See context, Gen. xxx. 12, 13. "And Zelphn ("The light of emulation") the handmaid of Leia ("smoothness") conceived again and brought forth a second son unto Jacob ("Smitten and Healed"), and Leia said, Blessed happy am I, because the women will account me blessed happy; and she called his name Aser." For an amplification of this seed-word in its prophetic signification see Gen. xlix. 20. "Asher (or Aser), fat is his bread and he will give sustenance to rulers."

Issachar (or Issaqap) ie, strength, force, nerve, organic power, like its cognate Latin vis; ou, feminine, singular of the adjective pronoun "thy," qap, root of yapic, good will, favor, grace. Whole interpretation, "Thy (God's) favor is power" or "Thy mighty grace." See context, Gen. xxx. 14 to 18 inclusive for the rationale of this name as developed in the simple narrative, and for the amplification of this prophetic seed-word see Gen. xlix. 14, 15. In the simple narrative we learn that his mother interprets God's giving her this son as God's way of paying "wages." Then in the full interpretation of the word we have an interpretation of "wages" from God's standpoint, namely "God's mighty grace." That ought to be clear to us now in the light of the gospel. Then for a still further amplification of how God takes man into partnership with him to work out this "mighty grace," Jacob says, "Issachar longed for that which was good (noble) while resting between the lots, and where he saw that rest was good and that the land was fat (rich) he put his shoulder to weary toil and became a husbandman."

Zeboulon (or Zaβouλwn), ei, root of Caw, primitive meaning "to move," derived meaning "to live," because life and motion are indispensable ideas in the abstract; βouλ root of βouλopai, "to desire, wish, will or counsel, and wn, present participle of eipi "to be." Whole interpretation, "The one who desires motion or life." See context, Gen. xxx. 19, 20. This was Leia's sixth son borne unto Jacob. "And Leia said God hath given me a good (noble) votive gift at this time (this season). My husband will prefer me. For I have borne him six sons, and she called his name Zeboulon." For the development of the seed-thought contained in name as above interpreted. See Gen. xlix. 13. "Zebulon will take up his abode beside the sea and he will be by the trush (see the idea of motion, busy commerce, traffic, etc.) of ships, and will attend along side as far as Sidon." How true the horoscope in the light of history!

Joseph (or Iwsyp), os, contract of eoo, stem of eaopai, "to heal," eyr, dialectic form of the root of eaqrc, originally the same root as the stem of eaqoc, wise, discreet, etc. Meaning of eaqrc, clear, distinct, plain, sure, certain, especially as descriptive of words, ta eaqrc, "the truth" illustrates a step on the way to the derived meaning of "wise." Whole interpretation of the name "sure healing," or "the way wisdom healeth." See how beautifully this name forecasts Joseph's character. For the rationale of his receiving this name see Gen. xxx. 21-24 inclusive, "And God remembered Rachel ("Root of Mercy" with the symbolic cross r between the root and the mercy, Paxrl) and God hearkened unto her and opened her womb; and she conceived and brought forth a son unto Jacob; and Rachel said God hath taken away my reproach; and she called his name Joseph, saying, May God grant me another son." For the fuller horoscopic development of this significant name, both as regards Joseph himself and in its broader, Messianic import, as indicative of the character and mission of the Christ, see Gen. xlix. 22-26 inclusive (see translation given in previous paper).

Benjamin (or Beneqec), Ben, a root common to the Hebrew, Syriac, and other Eastern languages, meaning "son," ie, root of iaopai, "to heal;" pec, a dialectic form of the third personal pronoun in all the genders singular; context showing that it is used here in the feminine gender. Whole interpretation, "A son to heal her." See context, Gen. xxxv. 17, 18, "And it came to pass when she (Rachel) was bringing forth with difficulty, the midwife said to her, be of good courage, for this one is a son for thee. And it came to pass when her life was departing (for she died), she called his name, "Son of my birth-pang" (or woe). But the father called his name, "Son to heal her" (or Benjamin). For the horoscopic development of the seed-prophecy contained in this name, see Gen. xlix. 27. "Benjamin is a rapacious wolf. In the early day (or morning) he will still devour, and in the evening he will afford sustenance."

Again Benjamin as a nationality stood by Jouda in the revolt of the ten tribes against the divinely appointed leadership of David as the representative "Divider of Bread" and divider of "spoils," and the reader will remember that Paul gloried in coming of the tribe of Benjamin as his generic stock. Then, too, see how beautifully Rachel's "woe" prefigures the "woe" or (birth-pang) of the "Old Covenant church" in "bringing forth" the Christ. It, too, died in bringing forth a "Son of Healing." Then look up the prophecies in regard to "the healing of the woe or blow of the Daughter of Sion, or of my royal people." They the later prophetic promise of healing for "Rachel weeping for her children." The reader will see that the "wolf" nature, so marked in Benjamin, must be eradicated before the person can "afford or furnish sustenance," and this is what regeneration in Christ does. Much more might be elaborated in this line of teaching, but "a word to the wise" is sufficient.

BE YE PERFECT.

"Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." Matt. v. 48.

It often happens that the reader is confused in relation to the exact meaning of a text which has been used to bolster up some peculiar dogma. This idea is well illustrated by the above text from Matthew. A class of religionists have appeared at various times claiming absolute perfection, and that man in the present life can live sinless and be morally perfect. The sceptic, on the other hand, claims that Christ taught a false system of moral philosophy, inasmuch as he taught perfection of life while the being is really imperfect. So it is asked: how can an imperfect being be morally perfect? Then again men are called upon to seek forgiveness from God, daily. Forgiveness presupposes wrong-doing, and he who seeks forgiveness must have erred from the path of right. It is in view of these two positions that the reader finds himself confused, and at times at a loss for a proper explanation of the text, which seems to require an impossibility. We can see no difficulty in the passage quoted. It appears clear enough when taken in its broadest and most complete sense. The religionist forces into the text a meaning which is not intended, and the sceptic takes advantage of the position thus stated and proves an inconsistency. We suggest the following as a fair and easy solution of the supposed difficulty.

Perfection in the highest possible standard. Man is required to direct all of his efforts toward that result. But it is neither claimed nor expected that he will attain perfection by one day's effort, neither is it claimed that perfection can be attained while man is in the imperfect state. If the present life was the end of human existence, then, indeed there would be a real difficulty. But it is said, "the path of the just is the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." Prov. iv. 18. The apostle also says, "When that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away." 1 Cor. xviii. 10.

Christ's command to be perfect reaches forward to the perfect day, and the path grows brighter and shines more and more until that day is reached by him who seeks to be perfect. The gospel finds man imperfect, sinful and mortal, but it does not perform a miracle and perfect him in an instant. It commences the work of dispelling his ignorance, of purifying his moral nature, and continues its work until the man becomes in reality an immortal son of God, equal unto the angels in the perfect day. So Christ meant to hold up before man a perfect standard which he could reach by divine aid when that which is perfect is come. Hence a most consistent and rational commandment.

Wife and I reached home from Florida Saturday, May 8th. The next day I preached to a large and attentive audience of my brethren, friends and neighbors. In the afternoon we assembled at the water and I had the blessed privilege of baptizing my eldest son Elmer, my nephew John W. Paris and his wife, and my niece Amanda Paris, into the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. John W. Paris is a son and Amanda Paris is a daughter of Brother Barry Paris. My health is much improved. I expect to be with you at the quarterly conference to be held at Antioch, June 11th, and hope to meet a large number of the brethren there and have one more good meeting before the Savior comes. Your brother,

Children's Hymn.

From a sunny morning
To the starry night,
Every look and motion
Meets our Father's sight.
From our earliest breath
To our latest year,
Every sound we utter
Meets our Father's ear.

Let us, then be careful
That our look shall be
Brave and kind and cheerful,
For our Lord to see.
Help us, O our Father!
In our earnest plea –
Teach thy little children
How to love thee.

Wearing Sunshine.

"You can't guess, mamma, what grandma Davis said to me this morning, when I carried her the flowers and the basket of apples!" exclaimed little Mary Price, as she came running into the house, her cheeks red as twin roses.

"I am quite sure, darling," said mamma, "that I can not; but I hope it was something pleasant."

"Indeed it was, mamma," said Mary. "She said, 'Good morning, dear; you are weaving sunshine.' I hardly knew what she meant at first, but I think I do now; and I am going to try to weave sunshine every day."

"Mother," concluded Mary, "don't you remember that beautiful poetry, 'Four Little Sunbeams,' you read to me one day? If those sunbeams could do me so much good, I think we all ought to be little sunbeams."

After a few moments' pause a new thought seemed to pop into Mary's head, and she said, "Oh, mamma, I have just thought. When Little Potter was here she told me that her Sabbath-school class was named 'Little Gleaners,' and I know another class called 'Busy Bees.' Now, next Sabbath I mean to ask our teacher to call our class 'Sunshine Weavers,' and then we will all go weaving sunshine."

It is a good plan. Sunshine weavers will be kindly remembered long after cross, hateful people have been forgotten.

Dear Children:

The holy garments which were for glory and beauty are very suggestive. Knowing that God does nothing without a divine purpose it is delightful to search out his deep mind in its wonderful outflow, but we cannot comprehend its significance unless we catch the sweet controling echo of living truth in the New Testament. You will remember, woman was first in the transgression in Eden, and the Lord after filling her with the Spirit of wisdom and understanding, made choice of her to weave the covering which was to cloth Aaron or the "lofty one" with glory and beauty. The first garment the priest and his sons put on was pure, spotless, white linen, appointed as it is written, "To cover the flesh of their nakedness." The second was a blue robe which covered the first up. It was beautifully ornamented on the hem with many golden bells, and between each bells was an embroidered pomegranate, in blue, purple, and scarlet. It was named the robe of the Ephod, next was the Ephod, and fastened to this, was the breast-plate with twelve stones, which were sparkling gems of exquisite beauty set in fine gold, these represented the twelve tribes of Israel. The robe and ephod was made without sleeves, and where it was fastened together on the shoulders was two sparkling gems called the onyx stones, on each was engraved six names. The onyx in the breast-plate of judgment represented the tribe of Joseph. It is written, "Thou shalt put the stones upon the shoulders of the Ephod, for stones of memorial unto the children of Israel, and the lofty one shall bear their names before the Lord, upon his shoulders for a memorial. So all the weight of glory and beauty was borne on the shoulders of the high priest. The breast-plate was four square being doubled, and in this was the Urim and Thummin, the signification of which is, "light and perfection." "And they shall be upon the lofty one's heart when he goeth in before the Lord. Then a fair mitre of pure linen was put on his head, on which in the front was a plate of pure gold, engraved thereon in large letters, was 'Holiness to Jehovah,' and they tied unto it a lace of blue to fasten it on high upon the mitre." This was called a crown. The garments being loose a curious girdle was to draw them together, constructed of pure linen, richly embroidered with gold, blue, purple and scarlet. Thus we see the high priest was clothed with beautiful garments down to the feet, they were unclothed. In comparing Scripture with Scripture, perhaps I may not be wrong in saying the first garment was a figure of the law, which was added because of transgression, to cover for a time [illegible] that which is perfect should [illegible] Blue suggests a cleansing process [illegible] it is used for this purpose. This garment produced a sound, each bell with its little tongue gave a joyful sound to the patient listening congregation waiting in the outer court, and it would have been death to the high priest if the tongue of the bell failed in touching the golden circle, or cycle, even as it is written, "And it shall [illegible] upon Aaron to minister, and his [illegible] shall be heard when he goeth [illegible] the holy place, and when he [illegible] out that he die not." This garment, or [illegible] cring up the first with its beauty, and certain sound, surely was a true figure of the over blessed gospel preached by Jesus Christ and his chosen ones, "whose sound went into all the earth," for they went forth sounding the word of the Lord, even the glad tidings, making those blessed who heard it. The pomegranate being a fruit whispered the glorious effect of the gospel should be, bringing forth fruit to the glory of his name who had called them. The pomegranate apple is extremely beautiful, reddish both within and without, its juice is like delicious wine mixed with little kernels. In the breast-plate of judgment, and two stones on the shoulders we have twenty-four names represented, those on the shoulders being memorial stones, no doubt whispered the twelve apostles. The exceeding weight of glory and beauty resting on the shoulders of the lofty one, suggests the time when the government shall be upon the shoulders of him whose name shall be called, Wonderful Counsellor, The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. The high priest never wore the breast-plate of judgment in the Most Holy Place. When the lofty one entered there, he was clothed like his sons, in pure, spotless white linen, crowned with Holiness to Jehovah, or a crown of righteousness. I would like to give you more about these beautiful garments, but fear I shall weary you with my long letter. Would add, the time had not come for the high priest to be shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace, which made the feet beautiful.

Your affectionate to Teacher.

"ALL, ALL FOR THEE!"

"All, all for Thee!" Dear Savior, may this watchword
Be Thine own keynote for my life this years
So sweetly harmonizing thought and action,
That none who listen shall a discord hear!

"All, all for Thee!" Oh, take me now entirely:
Reclaim each note with Thine own gentle hand;
I give myself afresh into Thy keeping,
To do or suffer, as Thou shalt command.

I give my heart, I long to love Thee better
Than ever I have done before,
That all I do may be a "joy, not duty;"
Lord Jesus, grant it—may I love thee more?

I give my will—oh, Master, do receive it;
It must rebel in any care but Thine;
I cannot keep it, it is no self-pleasing;
What rest to think it is no longer mine!

"All, all for Thee!" myself in all my weakness,
Take, alone, the feeblest chord to raise;
An instrument discordant, worn, and worthless,
But ready to be used to sound Thy praise.

O Master, by Thine own most Holy Spirit,
Send heavenly music o'er the earth through me!
So true, so beautiful, so soul-refreshing,
That those who hear it may learn more of Thee.

Of Thee, their Savior, who for them didst suffer;
Of Thee, their Friend, who loved them so well;
Of Thee, their King, who soon will be returning;
Lord, may Thine anthems through my whole life swell!

PROPHETIC PROBLEMS.—EUPHRATEAN WATERS DRIED UP.

In our last article we gave a lengthy quotation from Isa. xliv. and xlv., to show the prescience and omnipotence of the Deity, and his absolute control of human destiny, whether as individuals, peoples, or nationalities. Babylon at the time of the uttering of this prophecy, was an infant city. Cyrus was not born, Persia was then a country without note or history. The Jews had not been carried into captivity: yet two centuries before the events transpire, Jehovah gives their accurate history to Isaiah. Two remarks will here be pertinent, (a) Nations, in our times, are equally under Divine control: (b) We have a sample of the manner in which God once handled the literal waters of the [illegible] the (river) Euphrates, [illegible] Babylon would not [illegible] them to return when his chastisement of seventy years would expire, he began, in the far East, to adopt Cyrus (Persians), and a person [illegible] what [illegible] plan of diverting the [illegible] Euphrates, was of Jehovah, though apparently original with Cyrus. What Jehovah has once done with the waters of that great river, the (river) Euphrates, he may again accomplish on a vastly more extended scale, when he securely settles the world's diadem on the head of his Son, in the great controversy upon the mountains of Israel.

We are now prepared to show how the waters may be dried up, or utterly wasted: for such seems to be the sense of the word ἐξηράνθη—defined, to dry, dry up, parch; to wither, decay, waste away. It is by no means to be understood of the river in its entire length, but simply to be so divided drawn off, and wasted as to cease to be an obstruction to a vast undisciplined host of men, women, and children, as are oriental armies, marching westward, in haste, to take a spoil.

The reader is probably familiar with the history of Babylon, its location, and on both banks of the Euphrates; its vastness; its siege and overthrow by the Persian Cyrus, God's Shepherd: how its fall was accomplished, by diverting and drying up the waters. After some centuries the debris of the falling walls choked the natural channel of the river, throwing the waters, through artificial channels, all over the site of the immense city, converting it into pools and lakes of stagnant water; and finally totally obscuring even the site of proud Babylon. This terrible ruin has from generation to generation been increasing till the prophetic utterances have been fully accomplished. Jehovah spoke and it has been done. In the days of Theodoret, the Euphrates, at the ancient site of Babylon, was reduced to a very little stream, and being obstructed, as it took its course among the ruins, necessarily degenerated into a marsh.

Such pools and marshes have been increasing for more than twenty-four centuries. How terrible have been the vials of God's wrath upon the waters of this Eden river: the vial that was emptied upon it, for the sins of Great Babylon in oppressing his people: which vial reaches in its effects, to the pouring out of the second (sixth), which makes way for the Kings of the East. This emptying, drying up process, is still progressing as we learn from recent history. The following sketch has taken the rounds of our late journals:—

"The great river Euphrates is in danger of disappearing altogether. Of late years the banks below Babylon have been giving way so that the stream spreads out into a marsh, until steamers could not pass, and only a narrow channel remained for native boats. Now this passage is becoming obliterated, and there is danger that the famous river will be swallowed up by the desert." There are here two operative agents of its ruin: (a) Evaporation, it exposing to the sun's rays such an immense watery surface so as to add more than one hundred fold to its evaporation:—(b) passing over deep porous soils, the waters are absorbed with great avidity. Jehovah is accomplishing his terrible judgments by what seems to be natural causes. We have now shown how the waters are wasted, let us (4) now answer, the question, Why are they dried up? The text answers the question:—ina xxxxxxxx, x xxxx xxx xxxxxxx xxx xxx xxxxxxxx xxxx xxx xxxxxxxxx xxx odos ton Basileon ton apo anatolon, helion." "That the way of the Kings of the East might be prepared, (authorized version). "That the way might be made ready for the kings that (come) from the sunrising." (Revised Version). The two versions express the same ideas in part. One point is made clearer in the Revised Version, viz., that these kings are not simply eastern Kings, but they are marching west, their way passing over the Euphratean Channel. No other obstruction being named, we naturally infer, that, at the time designed, no other obstacle worthy of note, existed, and, consequently, that it is a march westward, of all the nations of the east under one confederated leader. (Gog). The obstructions would naturally be physical and national; but since they are all under one national standard, there could be physical hinderances only; here the Great River. A river, so reduced in volume as is the Euphrates, at present, would offer little or no obstruction to a vast army seeking plunder intent on robbery and national [illegible]. These kings of the Eastern, [illegible]ore, all the kings of eastern Asia and perhaps, Africa, who having been subjugated by Gog, the great northern despot, are now confederated with him, constituting one vast army, and marching westward, for conquest and spoil, as the Mogoolians and Tartars of old. They are marching towards the mountains of Israel where Jehovah is gathering them before the throne of [illegible]ment, that he may be honored [illegible]hrathen. The concentration [illegible]s of the East and [illegible]lestine will require extraordinary preparatory work, and, therefore extraordinary agents for its accomplishment. Of this period and its actors we have spoken at large in "The Coming Age," and "Eastern Question," to which works we refer the reader. Our remarks shall now be very brief. This question often comes up in the minds of the reflecting, by what visible agencies can the masses be induced to gather in armies to face the Almighty and his beloved Son in a decisive contest. The diadem of the world is the prize of the conflict. The right of Messiah to universal dominion, will be hotly contested; but it is only by the most complete deception that so unequal a struggle is brought about. The warfare between the two seeds, that of the woman and the serpent, began in Paradise. With varied results it has continued to the present time, with the battle-field occupied by the serpent's forces. Another, and decisive contest is impending. Great preparations on both sides will be made: let us see if we are not living in that extraordinary age of preparation. We shall notice some features of our age, and then compare them with the Divine predictions. If they agree we must decide that we are living in the age of God's preparation.

(1). What now is.—Man must worship something, for he is a religious animal. The world's worshipers are at present divided into three classes, or sub-families (1) the Pagan or idolatrous, (2) the Christian or family of Christ; (3) The Mohammedan family, or the followers of Mohammed. With the map of the world before us, let us glance at their distribution, and numbers; also let us learn their present state, religiously, socially, and nationally, with a view to discover if there be any extraordinary developments now in progress, and, if so, what they portend?

(1). The great Pagan family (including more than one half of the population of the globe) dwells in Africa, and in eastern and northern Asia. Paganism has a great variety of phases, worshiping everything but the true God. The eastern nations of Asia, as India, Thibit, China, Japan and the Tartars differ very materially as to their objects and modes of worship.

(2) Moving westward, in western Asia, and eastern and northern Africa, we discover a change in the nations, and also in their worship. The people of Mohammed, a native of Arabia, established a new religion, founded on a cardinal truth, (one God), and a radical error (Mohammed is the prophet of God). This family is numerous, containing nearly two hundred millions of people. This family takes a higher stand in religious intelligence.

(3) In Europe and in the new world, we find another family of religious worshipers, called Christians.

The world's nationalities have the same classification. There are Pagan, or Dragonic nations; Christian nations; and Mohammedan nations, or such as profess and defend the tenets of the false prophet. Besides these there are no nationalities. Each religious brotherhood aims at universal dominion, and therefore maintains a continued hostility, national, social and ecclesiastical.

Each family has a predominating race. The Mongolian is the Dragonic family; the Arabian, after that the Seljukian Turk is the Mohammedan brotherhood, or that of the false prophet; and the Caucasian, under this general division, the Gothic or German, and the Anglo-Saxon races. During the present century, these families, especially the last have developed such remarkable activity, and such wonderful traits, that they demand special notice. Let us call attention to some of those remarkable features. Every effect is the result of some adequate cause. When we, therefore, see any noted change, either in religion or in civil governments, we are apt to look for some legitimate cause. Let us note some of the changes and developments of the present century.

(1) In the Christian family of churches and of nationalities. (a) The papacy has lost its civil supremacy. In the dark ages and until the dawn of the Reformation, the power of the Pope was superior to that of kings and emperors. He disposed of crowns at pleasure, and no power on earth could resist his will. The present pope is obliged to pay taxes like any other citizen. Why the change? What has brought about such a wonderful revolution? The European nations once considered it an honor and duty to submit to the supreme dominion of the Papal Hierarchy. They submitted to her dictation, and supported her by their substance. During the present century these nations have cast her down, taken away her authority, and have withdrawn their vast pecuniary resources. Politically she is fallen! is fallen, and has to be sustained like any other hierarchy. How was this revolution accomplished? By new and extraordinary agents, working on the minds of the masses. These agents were of two classes; (1) Infidel; (2) Christian. Infidels were a class that had their origin in Papal practices. The Reformation set men to thinking, and by the workings of these two opposite classes the Papal altar and throne were overthrown and finally divorced. The revolution is a product of this age. The Reformation gave rise to the missionary movement, another product, peculiar to this age. During the night of Papacy, religious thought was confined, principally to priesthood. Bible doctrines were locked from the people, by being kept in an unknown tongue, the Latin. Under the reformation, the Bible was taken from its dusty shelves, translated into living spoken languages, and given, as a legacy to the people. It is not strange that its truths, subjected to the examination of untutored minds, should be variously understood and interpreted. Sects began to form and pride of opinion and selfishness beget feelings of bitterness.

Sects and creeds began to multiply and Protestantism fell into fragments. The Christian world, in this age, was divided between Christian liberty, and despotism. The one taught that the Bible is its own expositor, and that every man should be his own theologian, and governor of his own conscience; the other class taught that the church, by an authorized priesthood, were the only true expositors of Scripture doctrines. Hence the masses must submit their faith and practices to the constructions, teachings and dictations of the few. These opposite classes divide between them the Christian world.

NOTES ON ANASTASIS.—NO. II.

We further quote from this author for the enlightenment of those who have never read this work; as also for the consideration of those who have accepted the views herein taught without having duly compared them with the word of life. "In considering Paul's treatment of their questions, it should be remembered that he is speaking of resurrection or Anastasis, and not analysis or dissolution. His point of departure in his argument is not burial, it is not the putting a body into the ground, but the bringing of an entirely new body out of it. His discourse in illustration of the question proposed, has to do with the new body and that which succeeds it. The old body buried, is done with. It has answered its purpose as a medium through which a character might be developed. It dies, is buried and dissolves, leaving only a residum of dust. It is no more a body, as that whatever comes forth must be a new creation after the similitude of the first Adam to his original formation."

Here again the author neutralizes his own logic. He denies that the resurrection is illustrated by the sowing of the grain and its progressive growth. Paul says, "Thou fool, that which thou thyself sowest is not that body which shall be." Now if Paul used grain as an illustration of resurrection, then the body here spoken of is the body mortal from which the breath of life has gone. It is represented by the grain that now is scattered on the ground, yet he ignores the first body altogether and says, "Paul makes no reference to this body at all, but to an entirely new body which comes forth in the similitude of the first Adam." He says Paul's discourse has to do only with this new body, and what is to succeed it. Paul said nothing of a third body, neither did the prophets, nor yet the Master himself, nor any of his disciples. The theory assuming a third body is one of the most absurd unscriptural dogmas ever presented for the consideration of Bible readers.

I do most earnestly beseech those who have been blindly led to acknowledge mortal emergence to read carefully the next quotation, and then open your Bibles and search for the foundation on which such vain speculation rests. If you find it in the book, send it forth for the enlightenment of others; if it is not there make choice between the inspiration of the Most High and the vain imaginings of mortal man. "Now the thing to be accomplished in resurrection is the development of a spirit body, with the consciousness that the character flashed upon the new earthly body was evolved through an old, earthly body in a previous state. In this wonderful development, the new resurrected body takes the place of the old body dissolved in the grave; so that as far as body is concerned in the matter, the one character on record in the Lamb's book of life, when glorified, will have been related to three bodies, more or less intimately connected. The first, the body of sin; the second, the body like Adam's before he sinned; and the third, the second new body changed or transformed by quickening into a glorious, powerful and spiritual body. When this is manifested the process is complete, and the spiritually embodied character, raised Abraham for example, is clothed upon with his house from heaven. He is then raised incorruptible."

Observe here that the Scriptures speak of only the dead being raised incorruptible. What then, according to this theory, is the portion of the living waiting saints? Where in Inspiration do we find it taught that the character on record in the Lamb's book of life, will be found to have been related to three bodies? Where in Inspiration is it even intimated that we have a first, second or third body? Such groundless, vain imaginations have no place in divine inspiration any more than the endless torment of the wicked, the doctrine of the Trinity, the worship of the Virgin Mary, purgatory, or the selling of indulgences. All these dogmas are but the inspirations of fleshly minds, who, not taking heed to the written word, have gone astray after their own lusts, i. e., desires, seeking in vain to become wise above what is written! In the next paragraph of Anastasis it is asserted that "Paul illustrates this remarkable process, the resurrection, by the raising of wheat or other grain." This I positively deny, and I do so because there neither is, nor could be, any analogy between the two operations. I will quote this new revelation, and then show the utter impossibility of any simile. He says, "The raising of grain is a process which takes months to perfect, and it is not said to be raised until it is ripe in the ear."

Of the resurrection and change to immortality it is said in 1 Cor. xv. 52, "We all shall not sleep (in the grave) but we all shall be changed (to immortality) in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," etc. Is not this language plain and forcible? Why seek to wrest the Scriptures from their evident meaning and try in vain to bolster up a false theory? Where is the similarity between a moment, the twinkling of an eye, and months of vegetating growth.

Further he says, "When the naked seed is put into the ground, (Note, here he admits that seed is put into the ground when it is sown; this fact he has graciously denied, and he has given the word sow only the signification of scattering, not of covering at all)—that particular seed never reappears. It dies, loses its form, and is no longer a seed body, but is succeeded by a new body which appears above the ground. This is the sprout body from the seed sown, and therefore said to have been sown." A moment's reflection by any intelligent person will assure them that this last sentence is wanting in common sense, because it misrepresents nature in her works. The plain, truthful facts regarding grain sown in the ground are these. The grain, or seed, in order to be sown or planted must be put in the ground. When it has remained there a certain time, it sends forth two sprouts, one goes up and appears above the ground, the other goes down into the earth, even deeper than the seed sown. Neither of these sprouts is, or can be, properly called a body separate from the seed. They are sent forth from the seed sown, and become the media or channels through which nutriment is collected from the surrounding elements, to be in due time condensed through the operations of nature and form the new grain. If there were nothing left of the seed sown but what is named in Anastasis, "the sprout body," the body that shall be, or the new grain would never appear; because one half of the vegetating power would be cut off if the lower sprout did not operate in drawing nutriment from the earth and holding the plant in its place by the ramifications of its numberless roots and rootlets.

Still further following out this assumed analogy of the sprout body, if the sprout that comes above the ground represents the body "begotten in the dust of sheol" and cast forth out of the earth at the resurrection, what does the other sprout, which is equally important in the operations of nature, represent? Will some of the many writers among the Christadelphian body please explain why this unavoidable break in the application of the analogy of this figure? This writer continues, "But as Paul says, 'It is not that body that shall be,' it has to tarry for months until it shall have received a body according to the pleasure of the Creator. Here then are three bodies in grain raising more or less nearly related; the seed body, the sprout body and the raised body divinely given. (Query. Are they not all divinely given?) This third or raised body was not sown, the sprout body was the body sown because it sprouted or sprung forth from the naked grain cast into the ground." (Note. Here is another admission that sowing is casting into the ground. Yet in other places he argues that is is casting out of the ground). The springing forth is the third stage of the sowing process."

This is an unmeaning and foundationless assertion. There is no third stage in the sowing process. The first stage, or more properly the first act, in the operation of sowing is the scattering of the grain or seed upon the ground, and the second act is the covering of it up in the ground. Then the sowing is complete. The sprouting has no more relation to the sowing than the harvesting, for thousands of acres are annually sown that never sprout at all. He continues, "It is first begotten in the earth. It is then quickened or made alive, and thirdly is springs forth or is born. All this is of the earth, earthy, and without the further spiritual influences of heaven, such as air, rain and sunshine, this terrestrial and inglorious body would never become a raised body bearing fruit."

No intelligent, unprejudiced person can read the above paragraph and deem it anything but the most absurd nonsense! Is there such a thought or expression to be found in the science of agriculture, either practical or theoretical, as a first, second and third body in grain raising? Assuredly there is not. Was the sprout body sown any more than the raised body? If the sprout body came from the seed sown, did not the raised body do the same thing? only that the sprout served as a connecting link, or rather was it the primary condition of the succeeding fully developed body, or stalk that sustained or supported the grain?

Again, seed is not begotten in the earth. So far as science has unfolded to us the operations of nature in the vegetable world, the action of plants which most nearly resemble begetting in the animal creation, is fecundation, and this is the impregnation of the ovum of the female plant by the pollen of the male plant, and this not is not performed in the ground, after seeds are sown, but above the ground and while plants are in blossom, and the principal agents, appointed by the All-wise Creator to carry out this wonderful work, are the numerous insects and birds that fly from bloom to bloom, unconsciously bearing with them this fecundating substance.

Observe further that "to quicken, is to make alive," and if the seed be not already alive when put into the ground, it will never send forth a sprout. The sprouts, and all that follow, even to the perfection of the new grain, is but a continued and enlarged condition of the same life principle that was at first put into the ground. Thus we see that Paul could not have illustrated resurrection by the sowing of grain, as in the whole process there is not a single point of analogy on which to fix an illustration. Further he says, "that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die." Here we see that both the dying and the quickening succeed the sowing. Therefore if Paul wished to illustrate the resurrection by the sowing of grain, we must believe that if the sowing corresponds to the "coming out of the earth," as taught in Anastasis, then death must come after that, as the grain dies and is quickened after it is sown according to this mode of reasoning.

"FAITH."

I have been lying at home sick for several weeks, and that word has been to my mind a great deal of the time, not that I felt I was losing any of the choice articles, but I was questioning with myself why I, and all believers in these great and blessed promises had so little faith. Why, as the dawning of the better day seems drawing so near, we cannot, all of us, exercise more of that which is so necessary for our peace and joy here, and which draws us so much nearer, and into the "rest" of the coming brightness and glory of the kingdom of heaven. It is not, I think that we fail to see a God to walk beside us, but some way we do not seemingly dare to trust him as we ought. We take one step ahead and then falteringly, fearing, we step back again, or turning our faces from the divine look, grasp backward at the nearest hold behind us. [illegible] watch a little child taking [illegible] faltering steps, with the mo[illegible] and mother hands just ahead of it to encourage the feeble little one. The [illegible] take looks into the glad face that says [illegible] with strong encouragement "come," and its first step is taken, the little hand clasped firmly, tenderly, lovingly. No more fear from the child that mother will ever fail him, for it has perfect faith, perfect love. The child looks the parent in the face to understand her love and meaning for it. We look men and women in the face for the same purpose. Why not look into God's face, dear ones, without fear and trembling, take fast hold of the love that only is wasting and burning there for us in our slow turning to it. The world is full of breathing humanity and almost rebuff of smothered doubt. Ah! it should not be so, for "without faith it is impossible to please God. We do not guide our own bark of life, another hand, strong, firm and kind holds the oars for us. If we from nature have not that element of trust so strong in us as others, we may ask for whatever we need and God will give it; let us bring all we have and lay it at God's feet, a grand and beautiful gift to man touched with the light of his countenance and love. Faith! how much is implied in that one word, and yet it is only one of the many colors of which our lives are composed, and it takes the blending of all to make the whole, just as it takes the whole brilliant settings of the twelve stones to make the wall of the New Jerusalem. "Like unto a Jasper and a Sardine stone." See! how these tell the the story of Christ's life for us." The crimson that lies at the beginning—it is the color of passion, suffering. Out of the crimson we climb into the blue, —that is truth and calm. Beyond, is the white glistening chalcedony, for purity; and next, flashes out the green,—the hope of glory. Then they mingle and alternate, the tenderness and the pain, and the purifying, it is the veined sardonyx stands for that, the life story. The blood red sardine is the sixth stone, the whole triumphant love that contains and overwhelms all passion; the blessedness intense with its included anguish. It is the middle band, the supreme and central type; crowning the human, underlying the heavenly. Then the tints grow clear and spiritual; chrysolite, golden-green, touched with a glory manifest; the blending of a rarer and serener blue—the wonderful, sea pure beryl. Then, the sun-filled rapture of the topaz; and chrysoprase, where flame and azure find each other, the joy of the Lord, and the peace that passeth understanding. In the end, the Jacinth purple and pure amethyst, hinting at the far distance of ineffable things. Is not their language the story of his life, and how could it be perfect without the whole, and how can our lives be perfected without the purifying; looking into Christ's life helps us better to understand the shades necessary for our own life. The nettling, irritating thorns cast into our pathway by some who would only cast them out to pierce us with, unconsciously are the very helps by which we reach and gather the fragrant blossoms, reach and grasp the love of God. The burden at this step that we lift and bravely carry, the sorrow but just beyond awaiting us, are only pointing us to the rays of sunshine that begins even now to glisten and shine for us just beyond where are the hills of God, at the top of which is the entering door. Not always to walk by faith, for he shall stand his feet in that day upon the mountain, and we may walk by his side no more faithless and unbelieving, no more tear-stained cheeks, for his hand has passed in love and gathered the tears and exchanged them for joy and peace. Take courage lone ones, sad-hearted, burden-bowed, for the burden-bearer is on his way, and soon will be heard the glad cry, All is well.

A letter was written to me at the time of Brother Spencer's funeral, requesting me to write a notice of his death. The letter has not reached me. Today I received a letter from Sister Spencer informing me that such a letter had been written, and that the friends had been watching every paper since for the notice. This explains why the notice has been so long delayed.

Died, March 13th, 1880, at Leroy, Calhoun Co., Mich., D. F. Spencer, aged forty-six years, after an illness of three months, which he bore with remarkable patience and observfulness. After his death it was found by post mortem examination that he died of cancer in the stomach. He was not confined to his bed much of the time, and suffered very little until a short time before his death. He did not know the cause of his sickness, but supposed it was some form of dyspepsia, and was confident of his recovery [illegible] the last day when he was too fee[illegible] His faith and hope in the [illegible] these [illegible] family moved [illegible] and when he was 18 years old the family moved back to the State of N. He served nearly three years in the war of the rebellion. After his return home he moved to Jamestown, Ottawa Co., Mich., where he and his wife heard the gospel of the kingdom for the first time. They both had ears to hear, they were teachable, and when they had heard and understood the gospel, they received it in good and honest hearts and were baptized, since which time they have both adorned the doctrine by well ordered lives and Godly conversation. At the time of his death he was president of the Michigan State Conference, in which capacity he had served it very acceptably for several years.

He was a kind and loving husband and father and the loss to the family is irreparable. He had the respect and esteem of the community in which he lived. The funeral discourse was delivered by Brother Hoyt to a large and attentive audience, from the words, "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory." Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, for such will be made alive at his coming.

THE MAN OF MACEDONIA.—Acts xvi.

Oh, for a vision, or a voice to lead me.
To show me plainly where my work should be!
Look where I may fresh hindrances impede me;
Vain, and unanswered, seems my earnest cry.

Heak unbelieving one: but for thy blindness,
Not for thine own impatience and self-will,
Thou wouldst see thy Master's loving kindness—
Who, by these hindrances, is leading still.

He who of old, through Phrygia and Galatia,
Led the apostle Paul, and blessed him there,
If he forbid to "preach the word in Asia,"
Must have prepared a work for them elsewhere.

Courage and patience! in the Master sleeping!
Lose he no plan, no purpose of love!
What though awhile His counsel be for keeping!
It is maturing in the world above.

Wait on the Lord! in his right hand be bidden,
And go not forth to smite or strive alone:
Even like a sin!—the tempting work "forbidden,"
God's love for souls, be sure, exceeds thine own.

The Master cries! why feel or seem so lonely?
Nothing can interrupt real work for God:
Work may be changed; it cannot cease, if only
We are resolved to cleave unto the Lord.

None are good works for thee but works appointed.
Ask to be filled with knowledge of His will,
Oval what it may! Why live a life disjointed?
One work throughout—God's pleasure to fulfil!

But if indeed some special work awaits thee,
Canst thou afford this waiting time to lose?
By each successive task God educates thee!
What if the iron be too blunt to cut?

Can wills be built with untempered mortar?
Or fish be caught in the unmeshed seam?
Must not the metal pass through fire and water,
If for the battle-field it would prepare?

Oh! thou unpolished shaft, why leave the quiver?
Oh! thou blunt ax, what forest can't thou hew?
Unsharpened sword, can't thou the opposed deliver?
Go back to thine own maker's forge anew!

Submit thyself to God for preparation!
Seek not to teach thy Master and thy Lord!
Call it not zeal! it is a base temptation!
Satan is pleased when man dictates to God.

Down with thy pride! with holy vengeance trample,
Even each self-flattering fancy that appears!
Did not the Lord himself, for our example,
Lie hid in Nazareth for thirty years?

Wait the appointed time for work appointed;
Toil by the Sampler's willet thou be anointed!
Fresh be the oil wherewith thou art anointed:
Let God prepare thee for the work prepared.

THE KINGDOM. No. 4.

The teaching of [illegible] kingdom ex[illegible] by [illegible]

[illegible] phies the high [illegible] saying, "I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God," the Savior answered, "Thou has said: nevertheless I say unto you, henceforth ye shall see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of power, and coming on the clouds of heaven." Matt. xxvi. 64. These words are evidence not only that Jesus was the Anointed, the King, but that his kingdom was future.

The following passages also indicate that the kingdom is future:—Matt. xxvi. 29: "But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom." Mark xiv. 25: "Verily I say unto you, I will no more drink of the fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new in the kingdom of God." The words of Luke, chap. xxii. 18, in giving account of the passover, are yet more expressive; "until the kingdom of God shall come." Had the kingdom been established, as so many teach, in the beginning of Christ's ministry, how could he have uttered these words when his ministry was closing? Such language would have been without significance. Matt. xxi. 43: "Therefore I say unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken away from you, and shall be given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." Luke xxi. 31: "Even so ye also, when ye see these things coming to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh." The evidence here is decisive that the establishment of the kingdom is deferred till Christ's second coming. It has been postponed, put far off, nor will it again be nigh till we "see the Son of man coming on the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." When Christ was on the earth and preached the kingdom, it was nigh to the nation,—nigh in the sense of an offer of it to them, if they would repent, and the King himself being present among them: but refusing to repent, the opportunity passed by, and the establishment of it was delayed.

Some writers and preachers, probably through long and deeprooted prejudices, charge the disciples with misapprehending the true nature of the kingdom of God. But surely they little think how much is implied in their charge; how such a charge indeed reflects upon the Great Teacher himself. The disciples received their commission from Christ; they went not of themselves, but he sent them; and before he sent them they received instruction from his lips. He had a perfect knowledge of what they understood by the kingdom, and he never said that they misconceived its nature. So far from that, he proclaimed the same kingdom, and proclaimed it in similar language. Can we suppose, therefore, that he would send forth his disciples to proclaim what was false doctrine? to raise expectations that would never be realized? in a word to deceive their hearers on a subject of such importance? We cannot thus reflect upon Christ, or lower the disciples. And yet this is the natural result of the common system of spiritualizing. But we enter our solemn protest against it.

The disciples understood the nature of the kingdom; and the fact that Christ sent them to preach the gospel of the kingdom, shows that he regarded them as fitted for the work. However they might then lack some other qualifications for the discharge of other obligations, they had the qualification for that particular mission. The nature of the kingdom, as it is to be restored, being fully delineated by the prophets, they were well conversant with the meaning of it. But there was one thing in relation to it that was not revealed by the prophets; nor was this thing revealed to the disciples; we refer to the time when the restoration shall take place. And on a point that was purposely and for a wise end kept secret, they could be in error, and yet be right in respect to the nature of the kingdom. After Christ had risen from the dead, during the forty days he presented himself to the apostles, he spoke of the things concerning the kingdom of God; and it was then that they inquired whether at that time he would restore the kingdom to Israel. He did not say that they erred in expecting such a restoration. He did not say that they had misunderstood the prophecies, or his own instructions on that subject. He did not tell them that they were to put a spiritual, or mystical meaning on the language of the prophets; his reply to their question gave not the least indication that he thought them in error in looking for the restoration. Their error simply related to the time, not to the thing itself. Hence he told them it was not for them "to know [illegible] seasons, which the Father [illegible] within his own authority." Acts i. 7.

We have no wish to hide the fact that in the early part of their ministry, when they proclaimed the kingdom, they were ignorant of some things; but they were things which at that stage of their ministry it was not necessary for them to be instructed in. Fuller instructions and revelations would be given to them in due time. For instance, they were ignorant then that their people would reject the claims of the Christ, and by impenitence and hardness of heart render themselves unfit for the kingdom, and so cause a postponement of it. They knew not that during the nation's unbelief and disobedience, God would make a special offer of grace to other nations, to gather out of them a people for his name, and that the restoration of the kingdom would be delayed till the church, or the body of Christ, was completed, the time for which was appointed by the Father, but not made known. Christ revealed to them, at different stages, what it was needful for them to know. On some points he found them slow to learn and understand, but on those points he took pains to enlighten their minds.

But further, in connection with the proclamation of the gospel of the kingdom, and in compassion for the distressed multitudes, who needed a shepherd, and required laborers among them, he gave them miraculous power, which must be regarded as a confirmation of their mission and of the things that they declared. "And he called unto him his twelve disciples, and gave them authority over unclean spirits, to cast them out, and to heal all manner of disease and all manner of sickness." Math. x. 1.

TOUCHING ACCOUNT OF THE SORROWS OF A RUSSIAN JEW.

No one, I am sure, is more pleased or more grateful than the humble missionary of the cross, when he is able to state that, his labor is progressing, and that the Lord is with him in the dreary hours of the gainsayings of men, turning darkness into light, and sorrow into joy. This experience which I have made during very many years, has been reproduced recently in cases of deep interest, specimens of which I will sketch briefly.

My labor with the Jews here is of a character altogether different from that in other places, arising chiefly from the mixed Jewish nationalities inhabiting this city. There are the southern German Jews, totally ignorant of all religion and living "without God," literally a godless life, and "without hope," believing that, with this life everything ends. Then there are the Bohemian and Viennese Jews, who have imbibed the habits of the Austrian natives in general, and who live lives of sinful pleasure, until roused either by conscience within, or by the voice of the messenger of the cross who reminds them, as opportunity offers, either by the gentle accents of the immortal Gospel, or by the thunders of Sinai, and the powerful judgments of Jehovah, the eternal God of his fathers. And then, lastly, there are the Russian and Polish Jews, forlorn and neglected by all, and despised by most, and yet clinging to the religion of their fathers; ignorant, alas! also, of the way of salvation, yet accessible and favorable to the truths of the everlasting Gospel. It is really most remarkable, and almost wonderful, what some of these Jews have to pass through and what heavy afflictions they have to undergo, ere the Gospel, with its hopeful and consoling accents reaches their desolate hearts. I will give here the outlines of the history of one of those unhappy sons of Abraham, of the name of Kahn, a native of Kiew in Russia.

During the terrible persecutions of the Jews in Russia, the city of Kiew was especially distinguished for bloodshed, plunder, and other cruel atrocities against the Jews, during which the family of Khan with many others suffered most severely. When the massacres were at the highest point, Mr. K., then a young man of nineteen years of age, succeeded in making his escape: but, alas! he was forced to wander about in the wilds of Russia day and night, in constant danger of losing his life, and not knowing where to look for food and shelter. Thus he pushed on his way, sometimes finding a compassionate heart, at other times finding some little employment, until he came to the city of Taganrog, on the sea coast, where he hoped to find refuge, unrecognized, and also some means of subsistence. But means of subsistence he could not find, and his physical life was slowly passing away, as he had been without food for several days, when he perceived a number of men engaged loading a large ship with wheat. The thought entered his mind, "Perhaps I might also find here something to do." He, therefore, went to the master and put his request before him, to which he assented; but the physical frame of the poor Jew was nearly exhausted, and having to mount the ship with a heavy burden of grain across a narrow plank, he broke down, after which he was told to go, as he was unfit for the work. He was now on the brink of despair. Friendless, forlorn, and penniless, afraid of being recognized, he determined to put an end to his miseries by throwing himself into the sea. But although his wicked thought was conceived by him, and though he seemed to be forsaken by God wholly, the merciful eye of a loving Father watched over him, and his suicidal purpose was not carried out. He had not heard the message of mercy yet; the task assigned to him in this life was not yet accomplished; and the resolve to destroy himself was providentially frustrated. As he was going to carry out his purpose, he was afraid lest the people at the port should prevent it, and, therefore, he walked some distance away along the shore; alone with his dreary thoughts, and longing to end life with its misery in a watery grave. Just as he was going to carry out his terrible resolution, and seeing nothing but the gates of death before him, his eye was suddenly arrested by an object which in his despair he had not before observed. A few steps before him sat the venerable image of an old fisherman, having the implements of angling near him, and his whole mind seemed absorbed in the success of his work. Seeing this, the poor sufferer was, as it were, suddenly revived, went up to the old man, and after having saluted him, asked whether he could be of any assistance to him, and told him his terrible tale of woe as far as it was advisable. The old fisherman took compassion upon him, took out his hard fare and shared it with him, and then taught him how to angle, and then instructed him further where to sell his fish after having caught them, which he comprehended soon enough, and thus he spent four months, catching fish and then selling them in Taganrog, and thus saving a little money necessary for his further movements. His gratitude to the fisherman, who in the Providence of God was the means of saving his life, is, indeed, unspeakable. He then left for Odessa, where he found employment, but his mind was ill at ease, because he had not turned his back entirely upon the Russian Empire. As soon, therefore, as possible he left, and arrived in this city with almost nothing, and began at once to look for work, which he found after much search, and where he remained for a considerable time, and was esteemed by his employers for his faithfulness and diligence.

Such are the meagre outlines of his great trials, which greatly contributed in clearing his mind of false ideas of God's purpose with mankind in general, and in exterminating the narrow-minded notions of orthodox Judaism in which he had been brought up, such as that the Jews alone are the objects of God's love and care whilst the vast multitude of all other nations are one and all under his displeasure. But what is most important for us to know is, that his mind was to a great extent prepared through the sufferings which he had undergone for the reception of the Gospel seed. That Jew, and his wife too, are now diligently searching the truth as it is in Christ Jesus. In him they now believe, and I trust that ere long they will both confess him publicly as their Savior.—By G. F. Schwartz, Dresden.

Or, A Scriptural View of the Second Coming of Christ, with the Wonderful Signs that will Precede It, and the still more Wonderful Things that will Follow It.

—BY SILAS HENN.—

NOTICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS:

The book is truthful, reverent and instructive, every way worthy of the attention of those who prefer calm argument to sensational speculation.—The Rainbow.

We are desirous to express our sympathy with the general scope of the book, and to bespeak for it a wide and cordial reception.—The Messenger.

The volume before us is evidently the product of a thoughtful mind, and deserves the careful study of every Christian, being of a very comprehensive character, and based on Scripture. Certainly it is the best work on the subject which has come under our notice.—The Sydney Observer.

The treatment shows that the author has studied well and patiently digested his theme before writing upon it, and we feel as we read page after page, stimulated rather than clogged in our inquiry,.....The aim of his volume before us is to set the truth clearly before the mind, and so restore to its place in the consciousness of the church the hope that was once so dear to God's suffering saints, and is still so to many, but which is always unwelcome to a worldly, cold and formal church, and hated by the world. This little volume will be received and read with pleasure by all who take interest in prophetic subjects.—Rev. No[illegible] West, D. D.

THE COMING AGE,

—ITS—

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WEETHEE.—

This is a reliable book of surprising facts and knowledge, it treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and enormous wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research during a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. Is largely historical, and the work abounds in valuable facts and statistics. It explains the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents learned views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason, whatever events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the mighty of by-gone ages, and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the Great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 600 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $2.00. Send to this office for this work.

WEIGHED AND FOUND WANTING.

It appears to me that, as we look back upon human history, conclusive proof exists that the living God has been permitting the sons of men the opportunity of proving to themselves their fitness either for personal independence or national government. For six thousand years, nearly, man has been tried and tested in every conceivable condition. We cannot affect surprise at the result of this trial, for man is a sinner. That sinners should rule righteously would indeed be strange, and out of accord with "the nature and fitness of things."

This trial of man as an individual has gone on in all parts of the habitable globe, and has comprehended the experience of every nation, kindred, tongue and people. Every condition has been tried, every phase of humanity has shared in the test of sixty centuries, and every degree of physical, mental, and intellectual capacity has had place. From the aboriginal tribes of Australia, Asia and Africa, with their low type of brain vigor and crude civilization, to the high class Brahmin, the cultured Roman, the philosophic Greek, and the latest illustrations of progress instanced in the experience of the Teutonic and Anglo-Saxon race, it is scarcely possible to conceive any condition of which man as an individual is capable, but that condition has again and again existed. In this respect also "there is nothing new under the sun."

From the most degrading heathenism of the dark past on the one hand, to the highest manifestations of [illegible] tenth century civilization on the other man has had place, part and lot [illegible] Eastern Hemisphere [illegible] Western World (America) yielding the combination [illegible] And [illegible] We are bound to take the place of the mind of God, endorsed as that judgment is by the witness of facts. We unhesitatingly affirm that on all hands man has proved an ignominious break-down and failure.

I do not deny that there have been large numbers of individual exceptions to the rule, exceptions, be it remembered, induced through the restraining grace and word of God. I am speaking of human history in its vast majorities, in every century, throughout the habitable earth. From the standpoint of righteous Judgment, individual life and character has been, and continues to be, a melancholy disappointment. "Weighed in the balances and found wanting" is the verdict concerning man, not of the word of God only, but of human experience also.

Let us now enlarge our thought, and pass from the consideration of individual life to family history. The family is the life of the individual, the circle of a multiplied individualism. Here again man has been tried in every possible condition. In the direst poverty, in the highest prosperity, in penury and luxury, in hut and hovel, tent and temple, cottage and palace, in rudeness and refinement, on island and continent, in the unite of which the marriage state is first formed, or seen as the enlarging circle which belongs to the fruitful reproduction of human life—here also barbarism, heathenism, and the highest forms of civilization have had place. The time of trial has been ample, and has been permitted under conditions which embrace every variety of experience. Here also I may ask, what has been the issue and result? Again from the standpoint of the judgment of God, and in the solemn light of the facts of history, it may be affirmed that human life has proved in its vast majorities a mournful and melancholy failure.

Enlarge the family and take a survey of the widening circle suggested by tribal life, which in its turn gives the growth and development of the family. The same facts are presented to view probably nothing more painful of its kind is known to human history than the bitter strifes, jealousies, cruelties and ambitions common to tribal experiences.

Again, let our thought enlarge, multiply the tribes until national life has been produced. I am simply appealing to the facts of history when I say that the development of national life has never produced righteousness. Has it done this, either in ancient or modern times? Let Babylon, Egypt or Israel, up to date, answer. Let Greece or Rome give evidence. Is Europe at the close of the nineteenth century the abode of truth and righteousness? Are the nations ashamed of sin? Are they exalting God, and lifting high the principles and teachings of his holy word? Is it possible to identify existing conditions, e. g., each European nation armed to the teeth, and, as a whole, ready to put ten millions of soldiers on the field of slaughter, as having anything in common with the will of God? When our Lord Jesus Christ reigns in power and great glory, as he assuredly will, "the nations will learn war no more."

Is it not the fact that national history in its turn has been a pitiable spectacle and a splendid failure? Nation has risen against nation, kingdom against kingdom, ruthless ambition and devastating wars have been the rule. From the days of Nebuchadnezzar, the great despotic king, right onward through monarchial and constitutional governments of modern times, the same testimony of violence, corruption and failure comes; six thousand years of human rule is closing amid universal disquiet, unrest and fear. Not a single European Government rules in righteousness to-day! Neither is there a country, metropolis, city, town nor hamlet on the face of the earth where the principles of divine government hold sway. It is important to bear in mind that there is no form of government possible to man which has not been tried. Equally interesting is the remarkable fact that the verge of the last century of the six thousand years (the limit, as I believe, of man's trial [illegible] forms of government) sees the Western World (America) yielding the combination [illegible] in one compound [illegible] a [illegible] and complex sense. English, German, Irish, French, Italian, Chinese, Asian and African, indeed all Old World national life, is being incorporated in the structure of the United States Republic. Can this latest manifestation of human government be pronounced a success? Are the great cities of the United States eminent for righteousness and the elimination of iniquity? With the noblest of her presidents assassinated, with her past governments notorious for their corruption, is it not true to affirm that the drift of government in the new world is not the way of God?

Far be it from me to speak ungenerously of a great people amongst whom I love to preach Christ; but I cannot say that I have returned to England enamoured of American democracy. In the year 1884 no less than three thousand three hundred and seventy-seven men and women were murdered. This is an appalling fact, indicating a condition of lawlessness and a disregard of the sacredness of human life alike fearful and terrible. I believe I am right in saying that in England, with her thirty-seven million of inhabitants, less than two hundred murders were committed in 1884. The United States, with her fifty-seven millions, had little less than three thousand five hundred. Not less alarming is the fact that one hundred and eleven only of these murderers suffered the penalty of the Divine law, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." Gen. ix. 6.

In the great majority of American cities the Lord's day is the great day for theatrical entertainments and public sports, whilst, with scarcely an exception, elaborate and large editions of the Sunday newspapers are everywhere issued. This is not confined to what we should call the Sunday newspaper, but is precisely as though the London Times, Daily Telegraph, Standard, Daily News, and Chronicle were to publish a much larger edition on the Lord's day morning than any other day of the week. Beside this, the Sunday issue is the special medium for making known the aggregate of the terrible crimes which are committed. In one large city a prominent judge told me that the year 1884 yielded no less than three divorce court cases a day; in round numbers 1,100 cases of divorce in that section of the population, which does not exceed 100,000 men and women. Preaching in one of the prisons of the city, I counted 23 murderers in one row of cells.

In the light of these facts, can it be contended that the latter end of the nineteenth century shows man to be improving or approximating to good government? Is not the testimony that of continued failure? Whether we go back to ancient times and mark the history of the nations, whose corruptions ended in their overthrow and extinction, or contemplate modern national life in any portion of the habitable globe, is it not patent to every observer that, so far as righteous government is concerned, humanity is a complete failure? Has not man's subsequent history proved incontestably that man has by sin broken away from allegiance to God, that "by one man's disobedience sin entered into the world," Rom. v. 12, that all men have sinned, and everywhere they have endorsed and followed the corrupt example of Adam?

Is not human history the accentuation and proof of Scripture testimony? Can we wonder that God is about to close the long and dark chapter of human iniquity? Shall we not adore his wisdom and goodness in that he has invested all governmental power and authority in his blessed Son, who, as Paul puts it, "in his times shall show who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords"? 1 Tim. vi. 14, 15

The great crisis draws near when the Lord Jesus Christ shall "dash in pieces like a potter's vessel" existing governmental power. Psa. ii. 9; Rev. ii. 27. We are looking for the fulfilment of the words of the prophet Daniel. "Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and brake them in pieces. Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshingfloors. . . . and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth." Dan. ii. 34, 35. Our eyes are fixed upon that which is at once the hope of the church and the deliverance of the world from its bondage of corruption, viz., "the glorious appearing of the great God and Savior Jesus Christ." Titus ii. 13. We await with intense expectancy the supreme crisis of which the everlasting word thus speaks, "And the seventh angel sounded, and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our God and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever." Rev. xi. 15.

The apostle Peter, speaking of the last days of this wicked and adulterous age, says in the third chapter of his second letter, third verse, "Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as from the beginning of the creation." You will notice that their objection to the truth of the Lord's coming is described as an outcome of lust, not the lust of the flesh, but of the mind, the scoffers jest. The objection is based upon what we may call reason's view of the order of natural sequence. They appeal to the absence of anything supernatural or miraculous in ordinary experience since the fathers fell asleep, thereby discrediting in their modern material scepticism the faithful witnesses of God.

Now this substantially is the position taken today by tens of thousands of educated men and women, not in England only, but throughout the world. They have given up faith in the Scriptures as the revelation of God to man because those Scriptures are full of testimony concerning the things which are super-natural and miraculous. As a system of morals, as a marvellous illustration of past literature the Bible is accepted. As the divine treasury of infallible truth the Word of God is by these rejected. Miracle, by reason of want of accord with natural order, is the stumbling stone upon which they fall. The past thousand years, they say, have known no sudden and violent breaches such as belief in miracles involves; we, therefore, believe in natural sequence and refuse to exercise an unreasoning faith in the alleged miracles of the Old and New Testaments.

Many of these, whom I respectfully describe as Materialists, regard our strong confidence in the personal appearing of our Lord as the delusion of childish minds, minds without intellectual growth, children in the sense of weakness and non-discernment of "the great strides which humanity is making." The recent Mildmay Conference was, and will be, regarded by these as puerile, and almost contemptible. Our strong confidence in "the blessed hope" excites the smile of pity. Gallio-like, they neither care for these things, nor do they believe them. How important, therefore, to call to mind that the Holy Spirit has, by his wonderful presence and care, armed us in argument against these days of cold and philosophic suppositions, and that in language as opposite as it is assuring. It is not too much to say that the rock upon which those who reject miracle make shipwreck becomes to the believer a sure foundation in these days of widespread scepticism and subtle unbelief.

There can be no question that the Second Coming of Christ will be identified with wonderful breaches in natural sequence. It is equally [illegible] to say that a whole series of [illegible] on a scale of magnificent grandeur will inaugurate the commencement of the reign of the Great King. [illegible] not understand what is gained [illegible] ing the coming and presence of [illegible] ly Sovereign until the close of his reign. This surely is a violation in the fitness of things, which [illegible] ly or heavenly sovereignty be considered.

Let it be intelligently and firmly held in mind that when our Lord appeared at his first advent, miracle attended the whole of his ministry. [illegible] the Lord, [illegible] the lepers being cleansed, the dumb [illegible] the blind receiving sight, the [illegible] and the dead being raised, [illegible] and which among the proofs of his Messiahship, Matt. xi. 4, 5. Indeed, from the Virgin's conception until the ascension natural consequence may be said to have been in constantly recurring breach, and miracle Christ's minister of state.

It is also worthy of remark that all the miracles of our Lord when on earth were of a character which became him as the lowly servant of Jehovah. Thrice only did he raise the dead, thrice only did he assume the role of the Great Creator to still the tempest and instantly create the bread which satisfied the hungry thousands. His power over disease, sin, demons, over death, the elements, and disordered minds, yea, his self-surrender unto death, all declare how miracle attended as the handmaid of his hidden majesty.

Reverently we may affirm that none of these direct interferences with natural order were upon a scale of great power and glory, but he cometh again. "Art Thou a King?" said Pilate. Hearken to the reply of the coming glorious Lord: "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth," John xviii. 37. Now just as miracle endorsed and accompanied our Lord's ministry before, so also a miracle on a scale of power and great glory will usher in the days when "the Lord shall be King over all the earth; in that day there shall be one Lord and his name one."

I have only space to add a few suggestive words concerning the marvellous breach in natural sequence which will take place when he comes whose right it is to reign. There will be no room for the scoffer's ribald jest then, "For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that the Lord himself shall descend from Heaven with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God."

It is the Lord breaking silence by the magnificent testimony of the resurrection and instant change of the first-born. "And the dead in Christ shall rise first." The Lord Jesus, in power and great glory, now calls untold millions from the tomb. Forth they come, in instant obedience to his mighty voice, robed in the incorruptible glory which neither thought nor language can adequately portray.

Then instantly follows another tremendous breach in life's present order, when every true believer in Christ shall be instantly changed. "Behold," says the apostle, "I show you a mystery. We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed in a moment in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality" (1 Cor. xv. 51, 52). Then, when the dead are raised incorruptible and the living changed into the likeness of the body of his glory, we shall be caught up to meet the Lord in the air (1 Thess. iv. 17). Here indeed is the majesty of miracle!

Then follows the tremendous judgments which precede the restoration of the earth (see Psa. xlvi. xlvii; Isa. xxiv. to xxvi; Hab. iii) Then the Lord himself stands upon the Mount of Olives. A magnificent river is formed, which, opening out from the Mediterranean on the west, will run through Jerusalem and flow eastward to the Dead Sea, whose waters will thenceforth be healed.

Thus Jerusalem will become possessed of a magnificent river, which in the past she never possessed. This great waterway will fit her to become the great maritime centre for which God in the future has designed her (Isa. xxxiii. 20-30). The groaning creation (Rom. viii. 19-23) shall no longer be burdened, for with the manifestation of the sons of God the reign of six thousand years of "sorrow, lamentation, and woe" shall give place to the glorious liberty and songs of the day of the Lord, the antitype of the Sabbath, the thousand years of Millennial glory (Rev. xx. 4-6), in which "the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, and they shall not teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord; for all shall know Me, from the least even unto the greatest," (Heb. viii. 11). These stupendous workings on the part of our glorious Lord are but a part of the great series of miraculous events which will inaugurate the Millennial reign. There are many others; time forbids me even to attempt to indicate their order. All this is for the patient following out of those who delight with David to sing, "My heart is inditing [is bubbling up] a good matter; I speak of the things which I have made touching the King; my tongue is the pen of a ready writer." Psa. xlv. 1, 2.

May we not, in conclusion, appropriately call to mind the prophetic words of the seventy-second Psalm concerning the reign of Christ, "In his days shall the righteous flourish; and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth. Yea, all kings shall fall down before him; all nations shall worship him. His name shall endure forever. His name shall be continued as long as the sun, and men shall be blessed in him. All nations shall call him blessed, and blessed be his glorious name forever; and let the whole earth be filled with his glory; Amen, and Amen." To apply the testimony of seventy-seventh Psalm to Solomon was in very subordinate degree in the highest folly.

Have you ever noticed the addition at the last verse of Psa. lxxii? Seeing, as David did see, that his Lord should reign, and these conditions be the result of his wisdom, love, and power, the sweet singer of Israel adds, "The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended." Yes, indeed, prayer in his thankful heart had given place to the rest of the soul, to the sacrifice of praise, as he beheld the glory of the Lord. May we not ask, For what could he pray? Even so, come, Lord Jesus. Come quickly.—Henry Varley, in Israel's Watchman.

MICA-PEN NOTES.

I am thankful to the kind hearts, who have said a word by way of persuasion, or thanks relative to "Notes." I would cheer hearts hungry for sympathy if I could, for surely time is short enough in which to say, "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all, dear saints,"—and yet it is an easy and blessed thing to send benedictions, in Jesus's name, to such as love that Prince of their hearts and hopes, above any and every other being, or thing on earth, and under heaven. Why do we not magnify and love our Lord more constantly and earnestly? Love is the mighty power. Doctrine is great, but love is greater, and still they are intrinsically inseparable. To be mighty in doctrine but little in love, or to protest and contend and be very zealous, to be critical and controversial, these things may not exactly come under the caption of that apostolic protest and reminder, "and yet I show unto you a more excellent way."

The key-note of all things in our day, is the second coming of the Lord, the same Lord who called and taught apostles and saints, and who loves us, and whom we ought to love more than language can express. If we see evil coming, it is a sure harbinger of Jesus coming also. If we see wickedness increasing, it is a token that the Son of God is coming to overcome opposers. If a power shall rise in final and completed antagonism to God, it is but to be broken and shattered by the Prince of glory. If we look for an enemy to oppose, it is only as a shadow to bring into grander relief the sweetness and glory of the saint's deliverer. If there is a lawless one to be revealed, he is but the precursor of the grand ambassador of heaven to deliver the groaning earth. And who are they crying day and night unto God, and why are they crying? And as the darkness deepens there will be doubtless praying with a pathos and intensity that will reach to the very heaven of heavens. What to you suppose will sharpen and heighten, and make impassioned and mighty, the cries that are antypical of the poor widow's importunities.

Without asserting any thing, suppose we see something more immediately significant of the Lord coming from the glorious heaven of his power, when a long prolonged dominion of twelve hundred and sixty years, has over fore-tokened.

What a blessing and what a treasure to have Christ, the blessed, in person, and personally [illegible] midst of stupendous [illegible] deep darkness [illegible] when ordinary human [illegible] utterly unable to descry a knowledge which gives light [illegible] suitable as the bridegroom comes! What is the cause, or authoritative occasion and force of the cry, "Behold the bridegroom cometh!" What relation does it bear to the apostle's prediction of the "lawless one" or "that wicked," who when he is first revealed, is a loud appeal to heaven for the arm of God to rescue the praying, waiting, ready saints? How is it that all living Christians are translated at the very same time together, as some believe, when many of them have no faith in a pre millennial advent, or that it is in any kind of actual propinquity, and yet give evidence of Christian grace in other ways? And how is it, that first fruit and harvest are identical in time? Or if not identical how can they be separated by an intervening period of many hundred years?

Is it certain beyond all possibility of doubt, that when the beast which John saw bearing the woman, has three stages emphasized, of existence, non-existence and re-existence, and taking it for granted that this prodigy is in that second stage, riderless, is it certain that the woman may not be re-seated for a moment in the third stage? But I forbear, only stopping to speak of the wonderfully significant outlook. Some one has said, "we want the earth and the fulness thereof and we mean to have it." Do my readers know how much that declaration implies? I have no reference here to the promise of earth to God's people, which shall be fulfilled, in due time. There are many things of which I have made either mental or written memorandum, but which might not be meet for all, but which I think are most clearly related to coming events. It is well to be intensely vigilant, and to have an understanding of the relations of things. It seems to me we want well settled principles of interpretation, arrogating nothing, and always teachable. May the Lord open our hearts, open our eyes, fill us with the Spirit of his glory, make us vessels, light-bearers, reflectors, messengers, instruments of good, in this great and awful time now approaching. If the Lord comes immediately, may we be anointed, consecrated by himself to himself, and ready with every faculty alert. That is the word, alert. How are you saints, weary waiting souls, praying, toiling men, and faithful, holy women? God bless you all.

FROM Brother Joseph Bland, Kidderminster, England, we have received a tract containing an able lecture on LIVING AGAIN, as a title. It is designed as a reply to a sermon preached by a Baptist minister—Mr. R. Evans—on the Immortality of the Soul. We much like Brother Bland's manner, as he is not abusive, but relies entirely upon fair argument and sound criticism in dealing with his opponent. Revealed truth, in its unalloyed excellency and purity, has an able advocate in the author of this lecture. We have also received a package of tracts from Sister Carrie Williams, of St. Joseph, Mo., with title, What does Paul say of Resurrection? This tract is written with that care, fairness, and ability, so characteristic of our esteemed sister.

Today, Wednesday, June 2d, the day of publication of the present issue, is the anniversary of the Editor's birth-day, completing 77 years of his somewhat checkered journey of life in this present world. Though not a conspicuous actor in the drama, yet as a spectator watching the grand changes that have taken place in human affairs during more than three-quarters of a century, the writer can say of himself that his days have been cast in the most notable and sublimely important [illegible] of this world's history. Born [illegible] six years after the close [illegible]lonary War, the days of [illegible] youth were passed [illegible] women that [illegible] that conflict were still [illegible] part in life as those are doing who lived through the exciting scenes of the late great rebellion.

In 1809, the year of his birth, Napoleon Bonaparte was gaining some of his most important victories, and dictating terms to the crowned heads of Europe. At the very time of his birth events were transpiring most intimately connected with the fulfilment of the sure word of prophecy. On the 17th of May, the month preceding that of his birth, a decree was issued from the French camp at Schoenbrunn "that the states of the Pope are united to the French Empire; the city of Rome, so interesting from its recollections, and the first seat of Christianity, is declared an imperial and free city." It was decreed that these changes should take place on the 1st of June. On the 10th these decrees were announced by the discharge of artillery from the castle of St. Angelo and the hoisting of the tricolor flag of the French on its walls instead of the Pontifical Standard. In the depths of his despair Pius VII could only exclaim, "Consummatum est!"

Thus when affectionate hands were rocking the cradle of his infancy the might of imperial conquest and the shock of battle were overturning the thrones of political and ecclesiastical despotism. In childhood "Bony's" exploits were the subject matter of talk and news. "Old Bony," as Napoleon was then familiarly spoken of, was the central figure of the world's wondering anxiety. At the time of his birth also the whole country northwest of the present State of Ohio, was known as "Indiana Territory" and it was in the year 1809 that Illinois was set off leaving the then territory—now State—of Indiana within its present limits.

At the treaty of Greenville with the Indians in the summer of 1795, a piece of land six miles square was ceded to the United States at the mouth of Chicago River where the city now stands, on which first Ft. Dearborn was erected in 1804, which was held till 1812, when it was evacuated by the garrison, one-half of whom were killed in their retreat when but a short distance out, and the Fort destroyed by the Pottawattomy Indians. The earliest atlas ever studied by the Editor had all the country northwest of the Ohio River laid down on one of its maps as the "North West Territory." Every State northwest of the State of Ohio has been organized within his life time. Within that life time the whole world has been, in a manner, revolutionized. The great names that have been so conspicuous in modern history, have shone resplendent for a brief time and disappeared in the gloom of the grave. The Editor remembers well when [illegible]poleon was on the stage and when his death took place on the island of St. Helena, May 5, 1821.

Born within three months after James Madison's inauguration, he has lived under every Presidential administration of government except Washington's, John Adams' and Jefferson's. Every President has lived contemporaneously with a part of his life time with the exception of Washington. What it has fallen to his lot to hear the well-authenticated tidings of an impending revolution in the world's affairs that will sink all previous overturnings into insignificance. Earth is soon to become the heritage and dominion of a Heavenly Ruler who will control its destinies and sway its sceptre of universal rule forevermore.

If history has filled every decade of his life with events and changes most stupendous and marvellous, these will all be diverfed in comparison of what is now just before us. Our life limit is now very near, but not much nearer than the limit of our dispensation and of Gentile times. With thoughtful mien and solemn footstep we walk the limiting border of life's brief journey, and the overlapping boundaries of dispensational ages. If it be ours to die, we die amid the heraldings of the coming glory. The border line of dispensations may be nearer than the line limiting our earthly span of existence. At all events we shall soon be done with all things earthly. We must soon "set our house in order," and soon, very soon, write our valedictory. Our paper ought now to be in younger and more efficient hands.

FELLOWSHIP.

Fellowship is the state of companionship. It expresses the highest state of social enjoyment. Fellowship in riot and drunkenness is the highest enjoyment aimed at by a large amount of men and women. The fellowship of the world is simply the fellowship of men whose great aim in life is sen[illegible]ay be disguised by some [illegible]ame, and well-meaning people may deceive themselves and their friends by the use of some name which takes the place of the One companion without whose fellowship the present life is a black failure with no possible hope for a future. The aim of the Creator of man is to reproduce himself in him. This cannot be done apart from fellowship. No father can train up a child in the way he should go if he himself does not do this personally. Neither can the great Father of mankind make any one of his large family like himself without personal communion of fellowship. No two persons can walk together unless they are mutually agreed to do so. Fellowship therefore really means the agreement of two persons to walk together. Where mutual agreement does not exist, fellowship does not exist. Many have deceived themselves upon this matter and have formed a sort of artificial fellowship one with another based upon impure motives.

Marriage is a divine fellowship when entered into according to divine instructions; but it becomes a human fellowship whenever the divine instructions are set aside or ignored. The Church of God is a divine institution under divine instructions. The Holy Roman Church is a human institution which has its origin in Rome and draws into its fellowship all who are of like faith and practice as its promoters desire. Fellowship, public or private, human or divine, is the result of choice or affinity. It cannot be compelled or held by any principle of compulsion, except the divine compulsion, which is love. Every man that hath heard and learned of the Father has come into this fellowship. It is open to every one who has ears to hear; for faith cometh by hearing and hearing by the word of God.

God himself is the great attraction of fellowship. He is the first to seek and invite men into fellowship with himself and the last to break it off. First then there is the fellowship of the living. We live and move and have our whole being in him. How very full of enjoyment life, even mortal life, is! But although we live and move and have all our being in him, we do not reciprocate his goodness nor reach to the blessedness of fellowship with him until he lives in us. That he comes around us and sustains us in life is therefore simply fellowship with him to the extent of living upon his favor. But he is still outside and we have never heard his voice so as to be persuaded to ask him to come in.

Think of this, O my soul, how long and persistently thy Almighty Creator has beset thee and surrounded thy every breath for these sixty years with the one steadfast object that he might draw thee into fellowship with himself and fill thee with his own fulness. He is love, joy, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance. It is not simply that he has these and uses them occasionally, they form the very essence of his being, and they are begotten in every one who hears his voice and invites him to come in and take up his abode in him. The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, etc., and the apostle says that "he who dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him." And on the other hand he declares that he who loveth not hath not seen him neither known him.

He, therefore, who dwells in love, joy, etc., dwells in God and is in living fellowship with him, while he who loveth not his brother hath not seen God, neither known him—has never been in fellowship with him. The question, therefore, of fellowship with God or being without fellowship with him has no more mystery about it than there is about the quality of a tree that lives and moves and has its being in the garden, but never produces any fruit. The Lord simply said what we all know is true, that every tree is known by its fruit. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. If a man profess to be in fellowship with God and hate his brother, the apostle says that he is a liar and the truth is not in him. Nor is the whole benefit of this statement gained by us if we keep applying it to some well known professor. We must, if we wish to bear fruit that will be found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of the Lord, bear the fruit of the Spirit now each one for himself. We must walk in fellowship with God now if we would enjoy his fellowship in that perfect, blessed state when we shall see him as he is and be made like him. Fellowship begins in hearing the voice of the only good One and it lasts as long as we continue to do so.

Love not the world, said the beloved One, neither the things that are in the world, for if any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him. Love is not a sentiment merely, neither is it in word or tongue. It consists of actions of kindness to the poor, the weak and the erring. It suffers long, and is kind. The fellowship of the world is distinguished from this in that the world loves its own first, seeks its own first. Its whole being is based upon a system of barter in which the scale will be down upon its own side. Yet it has love, but it is earthly. It has joy, but it is sensual. It has peace, but it passes quickly away. It has long-suffering, but it is bounded in devising whatshall be eaten and drunken and worn in the exhibition and worship of self. Its philosophy rises no higher than the idea of present sensuality. And in this it totally misses the mark and in the end confesses with shame, regret and bitter disappointment that its all is vanity and vexation of spirit. Its fellowship has been broken in upon at every point. One by one its members have gone and at last he who has loved the world and the things belonging to it, has gone for ever and left all he cherished and valued most to the possession of others who despise his memory. He lies down in sorrow to reap as he sowed.

But the righteous has hope in his death. While he lived he had fellowship with the heavens. He now falls asleep waiting the return of his Lord, whom he loved although he had not seen him, whom he served in the persons of the meanest of his followers as he knew they were precious in his sight. He shall awake and be satisfied with the likeness of the Highest and enter into his presence to abide.

Editor Restitution:

I feel that I ought to write you a few lines to let you know how grateful I am for THE RESTITUTION, which I cherish next to my Bible. Though I have not the money to send to you to pay up what I owe for the paper, but I hope, the Lord willing, I will be able as soon as I can. The Lord is blessing abundantly in everything that I [illegible] except money, and it is my earnest prayer that I may have enough of that to pay up my honest debts. I have prayed a great many times to him in my troubles and he has heard and delivered me.

I must acknowledge that I am very poor in this world's goods. It is hard for me to get around like other people who are sound in body and limb, but I know that the Lord is my Shepherd and I shall not want, and he will keep us under his protecting care, and what he thinks is best for me that I will receive.

My wife and I are looking forward to the times when we shall be with Jesus our Head. We know that the day is now at hand and our earnest prayer is, Come Lord Jesus and come quickly. Not that we only will be delivered from this body of corruption, but that the whole world will also be delivered. We are living in the day of the fulfilling of Luke xxi. 25, 26. Soon we will see Jesus and be like him, for we shall see him as he is. How I have wished and prayed that I could get money enough to pay all up on my paper and get some of the good books advertised, and also tracts on God's word, so that I can put them into the hands of those that I know will read them. But it is all for the best.

There is a little church building here that goes by the name of the Zion Church. It was built by a sect called the Zionites, but like all others that build their houses upon the sand, great was the fall of that sect. The building is now open for any one who will preach to the people. Now I wish that some good brother would come this way and proclaim the soon coming of Jesus our King to set up his kingdom and reign until he has put down all enemies, the last to be put down is death; and that every knee is to bow and every tongue will confess that he is the Lord of lords and King of kings. All that will come will find a welcome at my humble home. I live 3½ miles southeast of the village of Geneva, at Zion Church corners. There are a number here that want to hear God's word explained. I am trying to place it before them in my weak way. I am warning them that the day of the Lord is at hand, and most of them acknowledge that now they can see the dark cloud of trouble rolling over the whole earth. Now I will close with a "God bless you" to all, and you will have my prayers that the Lord will bless and keep you all until the marriage of the Lamb. Yours in love and hope of the gospel.

Editor Restitution:

I have been a silent reader of your most valuable paper for some time. I am interested in reading the letters which appear in its columns week after week, so I will venture a few lines, that the many friends of THE RESTITUTION may know that there is one more that feels that she shall be saved through the great sacrifice that was made for me. From a child I was brought up to believe in the thousand years reign of Christ with the saints, but who they were to reign over I do [illegible] I gave a passing thought. [illegible] But I was taught to believe [illegible] were to reign on the earth. I must say my knowledge stopped there.

It has been our privilege in this neighborhood for four years back to listen to a gospel preacher by the name of William Prosser, and faithfully has he been trying to clear up the fallow ground here. I feel that he came as a missionary among us, like one of old preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching the things concerning the Lord Jesus. After the straitest sect of our religion I had been brought up a Methodist, and of course had the doctrine so imbedded in my mind that I could not entirely give it up for some time, although I never did believe all they taught. Now concerning the state of the dead, of course I had been taught that the soul was immortal, and could never die. I would have taken my oath that the exact words that I have quoted were in the Bible. Why not, I had been told they were there from earliest infancy.

When talking with a good brother once about this subject, he told me I could not find the quotation in the Bible. I told him I knew I could, [illegible] of course I failed to find it. I remember telling him that rather than to think that my life would go out and that I would not live or exist in some way or other I would rather be in torment. But I can now see that I did not know what I was talking about. Yet I am not the only one that will say that I hear the same expressions in these days. But in these last four years, I have learned to search the Scriptures for the same reason that the Bereans did. While searching them I found that we only have life through Christ. "For he that hath the Son hath life and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." I often wondered how a person could have perished that had fallen asleep in Christ, if their soul or spirit went right to heaven as soon as the person died, as we were all taught to believe. I find so many quotations in the Bible since my eyes have been opened, that teach me that we only have life through the gospel, for it is the power of God unto salvation. I feel that I can truly say that the theme of the gospel is better understood today than it was four years ago in this place. The people here have not the prejudice that they had then, they seem more willing to listen. And some are brought to believe in its saving truths, while others liken it unto sounding brass or a tinkling symbol. I do not know as you will think that these few disconnected sentences will be worth printing, (it will be all right if you do not), still I thought I would say a few words in favor of the truth as it is in Christ Jesus. I am sorry to say a great majority of the preachers of the present day do not preach a saving doctrine, that is the reason that so few embrace the doctrine of the coming of Christ in the near future, and of his reign and the glories of the age to come.

Bro. Prosser preaches at this place twice a month. I pray the Lord that more may be brought into the Abrahamic covenant and be made heirs and joint heirs with our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. I am trying to get some three month subscribers, for I too think after they have taken THE RESTITUTION three months they will not want to do without it.

Respectfully yours in Christian fellowship.

MRS. E. E. SHOOKS.

Editor Restitution:

As my time is almost out I send two dollars for another year. I am old and live alone, and have not heard a sermon since my husband's funeral fourteen months ago. I prize THE RESTITUTION next to my life and will take it as long as it holds forth the truth as it does now and I can read. I would be like a lost sheep without it. I want to get a preacher to come to Deep River in September and hold a meeting two weeks. What is John Foore's address? I feel grateful for the encouraging letters that our sisters write to us in THE RESTITUTION. They encourage us to press forward toward the mark for the prize and high calling in Christ Jesus. Your sister in the faith,

HARRIET PHELPS.

Terrible Locust Plagues.

The records of locust plagues, in the warm countries of the East, in modern as well as in ancient times, almost surpass belief. Kirby and Spence mentioned as army of locusts which ravaged the Mahratta country, extending in a column five hundred miles long, and so compact that it obscured the sun like an eclipse. Near the close of the last century so many perished in the sea on part of the Afghan coast that a bank three or four feet high, and about fifty miles long, was formed on the shore by their dead bodies, and the stench of them was carried one hundred and fifty miles by the wind. In another part of Africa, early in the Christian era, one plague of locusts is said to have caused the death of 800,000 persons, and in 591 nearly as bad a plague occurred in Italy. Again, in 1478, more than 30,000 persons perished in the Venetian territories from famine caused by locusts.—Boston Budget.

Youth's Column.

Now.

Love me now! Love such a little minute.
Day crowds on day with smile and noiseless tread,
Life's end comes ere fairly we begin it,
Fain to the joys and hope gives place to dread.
Love me now!
It will be too late when we are dead!

Love me now! While we still see roses together,
While glad and brave the sun shines overhead
Hand locked in hand, in shine, smiling weather.
Sighing very sin, and variance ill believed.
It will be too late when you are dead!

Love me now! Shadows hover in the distance;
Cold winds are coming! green leaves must turn red.
Evermore then, my Love, as this and instances!
Even this moment may the dart be sped!
Love me now!
It will be too late, when I am dead!

Holding the Light.

A dear little boy of five years, who had an old-fashioned Spartan mother, was brave ordinarily, but was afraid to be left alone in the dark. To cure him of his fear his mother decided to send him to bed alone, and to have the light taken away, which had usually been left until the little fellow was asleep.

This was a sore trial to the boy, and possibly to the mother, but most of all to the boy's sister, a girl about ten years of age. She could not forget her own times of trembling and of terror, of looking under the bed and hiding her head under the blanket. Her heart ached for the little fellow undergoing such heroic treatment, and she used to steal softly up-stairs with her bed-room candle and stand outside her brother's door.

"Are you there sister?"

"Yes, Willie,"

"Can I have the light?"

"No. Willie; mother says no."

"Do bring it."

"No but I'll let it stay right here,"

"Will it shine in?"

"Yes, all across the floor: don't you see it? You must go to sleep, or mother will take it away."

Then a pause, and soon the sleepy voice asking, are you there, sister?"

"Yes, Willie."

"Will you surely stay?"

"Surely."

"Till I'm all, every bit asleep? You won't let the light go out till I'm gone?"

"No, Willie."

"Not leave me alone[illegible]

"No, brother, never."

And all this in the briefest whisper possible; and if the mother heard, she did not heed, for the children were not forbidden to comfort each other in their own fashion, until by-and-by the boy outgrew his fear.

Years passed, and lovely boyhood and brilliant youth were left behind. Willie had outgrown his sister in size and strength and knowledge, but not in goodness or faith. Life parted them early—their lives went separate ways. Her love and her letters and her prayers followed him, but evil temptations crept closer to him than these, and little by little he became the victim of drink. It did not conquer all the good in him at once, but at intervals he yielded, and slowly and surely went down. Then it was that she failed him. She had been so proud of his talents, of his power to win all the world could offer, and now he made her so pitifully ashamed. When he repented she found it hard to relent. She hated the sin so bitterly that she almost included the sinner. She hardened under the shame of it, and lost faith in his efforts and promises, and while she did not give him up, she made him feel ashamed to come with his homecomings to her, when she knew that before the next temptation his resolves would go down like dead leaves in the wind. And so the distance widened, and she suffered much, and he went down and down. At last his health broke, and life drew near its close. Then she found him and drew near to him, nearer and nearer till the day he died. Lying with his hand in hers, he looked up at her as a child might do to his mother and said falsely?

"Do you remember, sister?"

"Remember what, Willie?"

"The light! the light! How I was afraid, and you used to stand by the door and hold the light!"

"Yes, yes, I remember, it was so long ago!" and she turned her face away to hide the tears.

"Never mind, sister, it's all right now. I feel like a child again, and I'm not afraid."

"Not afraid of the dark. No, you know who goes with us, Willie, when we come to the dark"—she could not go on.

"The dark valley," he finished for her. "Yes, I know. I see him, sister, and you hold the light, but—but"—

"But what, brother?"

"But you didn't keep on holding it always; you left me so many times in the dark. I would have been good sister, if you had—held it—every time,—but," suddenly seeming to realize that he was troubling her, he drew his face down as she bent over him, and whispered, "But now I'll be still. I'm tired—you will stay till I go to sleep?"

"Yes, Willie, yes; I will never leave you again."

"And—and—you will hold the light—for"—

"As long as you need it, dear."

"No, no, not for me—not for me; for all the other—the other" and the old smile lit up his face—"the other little boys in the dark!"

There was no answer in words. He would not have heard it if there had been, for with his pleading for the boys in the dark his life went out, and he was asleep.

Such lessons need not be repeated to any heart on which such bitter scourging has fallen once. But the boys in the dark are many, and many the sisters and mothers and wives that ought to be "holding the light."

Dear Children:

I find it far more difficult to simplify God's wonderful ideas unfolded in the things of the Tabernacle to your tender minds, than it would be to those of ripe years, and so vast is the subject, that I often forget that I am writing to dear children, but lest I should become wearisome I will endeavor to vary my subject. God's way which leads to life is progressive. Like Jacob's ladder, we must climb higher and higher, step by step, holding on to the bars of eternal truth. It was not the purpose of God to leave the high priest and his sons in the outer court, here they were made fit for his service, which was to follow on to know the Lord, working out their own salvation, with fear and trembling. This first step introduced them to a step higher, which brought them into the Holy Place, and while entering in, the glory of Jehovah overshadowed them, which rested at the door. In the Holy Place was the candlestick, the table, and showbread. There is something exceedingly interesting in the construction of the candlestick, which was of pure gold of beaten work. No doubt the wedge of gold from which it was made, had once been the beautiful jewels of the wise hearted women of Israel. Its branches were [illegible] which signifies "Completeness," [illegible] each side, and one higher in [illegible] centre.

[illegible] the beaten [illegible] form of an almond with its knops, and flowers, or buds, and blossoms. Let us dwell a little on this beautiful similie. The almond is the first to bloom in the spring, and the last to fade in the autumn, from which fact no doubt it derives its name. The signification of the almond is "To watch." There are two kinds, namely the sweet, and bitter. When the children of Israel murmured against the lawgiver and High Priest, the Lord decided the matter of contention in this way, "Bring twelve rods, on each let the Lawgiver write a priestly name, and lay each rod up in the Tabernacle before the testimony where I will meet with you. After the rods had rested beneath Jehovah's shadow of glory during a night of darkness, the Lawgiver discovered in the morning that the rod of the lofty one had brought forth buds, had blossomed blossoms, and yielded almonds. In this we have a figure of our Great High Priest, who was the rod of Jehovah's strength, made powerful by a resurrection from the dead. A rod out of the stem of Jesse quickened into the bloom of eternal life.

After the Lawgiver had shown the beautiful fruitful rod to the children of Israel, he was commanded to hide it in the golden ark of testimony where no light shined, but the glory of Jehovah. Again we have the almond rod shown to weeping Jeremiah, when he saw Jerusalem in complete desolation because the glory of Jehovah had departed. The word of the Lord came unto him saying, Jeremiah what seest thou? and he said, I see the rod of an almond tree. Then the Lord said unto him, thou hast well seen for I will hasten my word to perform it. Weeping Jeremiah understood although he saw Jerusalem as a seething pot, ready to be consumed, yet the time should come when Israel should blossom and bud. Thus we see that the bowls into which the high priest poured the golden oil for light, represented the resurrected sons and daughters of Jehovah, Jesus, our blessed Redeemer being the first fruits. These watchful ones, whose light was ever ascending, John saw, when he was banished to the Isle of Patmos and the angel told him the seven candlesticks were the seven churches of Asia.

Your affectionate Teacher,

E. CORTMAN.

"THY KINGDOM COME."

Oh, Thou who art our hope, our life,
Amid the world's unceasing strife,
Amid our cares from day to day,
We bow to Thee and humbly pray,
"Thy kingdom come."

The earth has borne its burden long—
Six thousand years of sin and wrong;
Creation groans in bitter pain
For Thee, our Lord, to come again—
"Thy kingdom come."

The "man of sin" is filling up,
Full is the brim his sinful cup,
And still apostle hastening forth,
Deceive the nations of the earth,—
"Thy kingdom come."

Our hearts are sad when we behold
The love of many waxing cold;
But some are waiting still for Thee,
And daily cry on bended knee—
"Thy kingdom come."

We know that summer time is near
When all the budding trees appear;
So by the signs we understand
The promised day is near at hand,—
"Thy kingdom come."

While in this world of sin we stay,
Be Thou our guide, as day by day
We travel o'er life's stormy way;
And may we ever love to pray—
"Thy kingdom come."

PROPHETIC PROBLEMS. PECULIAR FEATURES OF OUR AGE.

(1) Political, (2) Social and (3) Religious evolutions examined.

(1). The political evolutions of these days are as wonderful as they are varied. Increase of general knowledge is a noted feature among all nations, whether barbarous, semi-barbarous, civilized or enlightened. We shall enumerate three classes of nations, Pagan, Papal and Mohammedan. (a) The Pagan or Dragonic nations dwell principally in Africa, Asia, and in the Islands of the Eastern Oceans. They include more than one half of the population of the globe. What special changes are taking place among these idolatrous nations of the more distant Orient? One feature is the wonderful increase and spread of international ideas, civil and religious. The ideas of race, religion and national destinies are being very rapidly evolved in the direction of a universal brotherhood. Notice the changes in India, China, Japan, with the Tartars and Turkomans and Afghans and other tribes of Central Asia, as well as the benighted nations of Southern and Middle Africa. They are becoming known to each other and to the Western Hemisphere. The great West has sent its agents among them, waking them from their idolatrous dreams of the past ages to a life of new ideas. Introduced by these agents to each other and to the world at large, they have commenced a new and a higher education. One result has been the abandonment of national exclusiveness. Passing over Southern and Central Africa, India and China, let us contemplate the sea-island Empire of Japan. How does that empire of the last half century compare with that of the earlier ages? New elements are there evolved with amazing speed. The Dragonic world is waking up from her sleep of buried centuries, and as it wakes out of sleep, it enters upon its active mission. As Japan leads the Pagan world in its evolutions it will be of interest to notice some of its chief progressive movements.

(a) Among its most important developments is its educational system. Its present system of learning is quite modern, a transcript of that generally adopted by the enlightened nations of the Great West. Its religion is dragonic, it being controlled by its learned priesthood. The changes and developments are in her national ideas, to fit it for the world's brotherhood of nations. It is worthy of special note that the world's changes are moving toward a civil brotherhood and not a religious union.

As to religious thought of the great nationalities, there is a Pagan world, a Papal world and a Mohammedan world, each laboring under the vain hope that its creed in the coming age will be that of the world. The literati of the three national classes, Pagan or Dragonic, Papal and Mohammedan are laboring in the interests of their secular governments, not to diffuse their religious tenets, as will clearly appear by the interchange of foreign ministers at court. They are sent to represent the civil interests of their nations, not their religious interests. Their motto seems to be, In the political world one brotherhood, in the religious world entire liberty of thought.

The movements of the age are noted in their development of two remarkable features: first, intense national greed, second, the universal devotion to Mammon. Every occupation of the age seems intent on making to itself friends of the mammon of unrighteousness. Infidelity, in all its species, takes deep root and grows with wonderful luxuriance. The natural brotherhood of the world excludes all element of religious thought, ostensibly for the sake of peace and harmony, but embraces commerce, arts and sciences, in a word all occupations, which tend to feed and clothe the human family. "What shall we eat? or what shall we drink? or wherewithal shall we be clothed?" is the motor of this age, not a living faith in the kingdom of God and his righteousness.

The masses act out this sentiment: My religious tenets are secondary and may be laid aside, but my country and my political creed demand my treasures and my vital blood. Such are the popular devotions of men to human institutions, social and political, that the divine injunctions are without authority. Nations contend and carry on bloody wars for chief seats in the brotherhood, regardless of religious creeds. Such is true of this age, though, till recently, it was the reverse. Should the Messiah return, simply to establish a church by moral suasion, there would be no bloody contest, but his claim to the world's diadem will be resisted by all the crowned heads, whether Papal, Pagan or Mohammedan. They will combine to overthrow the dominion of the Son of God, as an earthly Potentate.

Till the present age, including about 90 years, the world knew no other idea but the union of church and state. This was the model of the great Gentile monarchies, also of the Hebrew commonwealth; but since the fall of Papal supremacy, and the infidel revolution in France, the altar and the throne have, in some nations, been divorced. This age is, therefore, becoming extremely secular, and as the element of this world's citizenship expands, the heavenly citizenship becomes less attractive, till finally it ceases to command respect or any special notice. Secular devotion is the popular worship of this age. Pure worldliness is the universal stimulant of all classes. The exceptions are rare as the grapes after vintage: here and there one, no clusters.

Socialism, in its Proteus forms, is a plant that springs up and grows luxuriantly in every soil. Every new thought is a nucleus of social attraction; new combinations are thus evolved out of old decomposing elements. If any new organization fails to become popular, it sleeps for a moment, then wakes to active life under some new and more attractive name. Thus combination follows in the wake of dissolution. This is an age of bundling. Matt. xiii. 30. This term expresses a work which, at this time, possesses extraordinary activity. It would seem as if all classes were pushed into associations, both secret and public, by some blind infatuation. Some invisible power seizes them and they rush or are forced into unions, labor unions, capital syndicates, unions to effect political revolution and the overthrow of civil governments. Some combine through selfish interests, others for personal safety.

What demands special attention at present, is the startling truth, that as secret, social, and labor combinations increase, vital Christianity decreases. True, here and there, we have a Sam Jones, a Small, a Moody; but these men produce ripples that soon subside into a smooth sea, ready for another tempest of human passion, rolling forward its wrecks towards the bottomless gulf of oblivion. In one sense there are but two parties, those for Christ and those against him. This classification originated with our Savior. "He that is not with me is against me;" no neutral party. Men may pretend to ride a middle fence, but they will soon learn that such is only imaginary. God or Mammon are the only two objects of supreme devotion. No one, at the same time, can serve both; every human being is now working in the interests of one or the other of these hostile masters.

The bundling of this age is preparatory to the gathering of the wheat (righteous) into God's garner (kingdom). Gather first the tares and bind them in bundles to burn them; then the wheat is gathered. What we are forced to believe, is, that we are now living in the age of bundling and of bundles; that this work is progressing with amazing rapidity, and with sad results to the bundling and the bundled. This is too true with all classes of laborers. Surplus capital may rest for a season, but the pangs of hunger produce a tempestuous ocean. The laws of union are severely despotic and boycotting. "You must join a union or starve!" "You must obey implicitly every command of the union." Gathered into bundles to be burned. In these societies and unions are found some grains of wheat; these are to be separated. By what process? This problem is very difficult of solution, yet the work must be done, for no wheat shall be consumed. It must be accomplished principally by those of opposite views.

(2) Christian world. The religious world has its peculiar features. Its tenets and its work are peculiar. We do not propose to give a learned disquisition relative to the peculiarities of theology of the 19th century. Our space and time forbid it. Should any one take the trouble to compare the religious views of Christendom for the last sixty years with those taught during A. D. 560–1760, he will be well convinced that there is now taught a distinctive creed in many very important doctrines. Aside from stated congregational instructions, there are missionary exercises in the interests of domestic and foreign missions. So vast have the missions become that the age is called "Age of missions."

During the early days of the Reformation Protestantism was obliged to act on the defensive, but, during the present century it, like apostolic Christianity in one particular, has been exceedingly aggressive. The Bible is translated into the principal spoken languages of the world; and for every translation there are many missionaries occupied in its circulation amongst those that speak the dialect. Could we see over the earth as God sees, we could exclaim, "I see (not saw as John) an angel (class of messengers) fly through mid-heaven, saying with a loud voice, 'Fear God and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come.'" This proclamation is being made; if not, it should be, for the hour of God's executive judgment on the little horn power (Dan. vii. 9–15) has certainly commenced and has been progressing since 1798. Let it be understood most emphatically that a horn is a symbol of civil rulers; the eyes and mouth (which were given) (by donations) are symbols of ecclesiastical powers.

Another angel (mission body) follows, saying, "Babylon is fallen, is fallen." This proclamation has commenced, or should be, since the event has transpired. This angel does not say, Babylon is no more—dead; but Babylon is fallen. She rode after the pure bride (noted harlot as she was) through the wilderness for 1260 years; rides to the judgment and receives her sentence which continues to be executed by the horns—European nations. If the sentence is being executed, why should the fact not be proclaimed? It has been proclaimed and the proclamation still continues.

A third angel follows the other two. It is one of great severity, since it is against the ugo idolatry, the worshippers of the beast (4th beast of Daniel) and his image (Papacy in all its forms). Human institutions and human bodies, governed by said institutions, receive in these days that devotion which belong alone to the Almighty. Jehovah and his institutions and commands occupy a subordinate position. The people make a God and then fall down and worship. We are not dealing in fiction. This is an age of man-worship. On the threshold of Messiah's return and reign of subjugation, nations are deified. If this proclamation has not gone forth, it should, for the time is fully come. That these proclamations continue and will increase in intensity, no one will question; but that we are living in an age made peculiar and exceedingly active by the labors of six classes of extraordinary agents, cannot be successfully controverted.

J. P. WERTHER.

NOTES ON ANANTASIS.—NO. 19.

But some who advocate mortal emergence will say, "Paul says" "So also is the resurrection of the dead." This is freely admitted; but in order ascertain the antecedent to which the clause, "So also" refers, we must carefully consider what Paul had been talking about with the Corinthians. Looking back in this epistle, we find that the same church began to doubt the possibility of the resurrection of the dead, and that this doubting could be traced to the giving heed to false teachers, who had come in amongst them, 'after that Paul had left for other fields of labor; and he tells them very plainly in verse 33, that "Evil companionships corrupt good morals," and then in verse 34 he exhorts to "Awake to soberness and sin not, for some have no knowledge of God. I speak this to move you to shame." Now let us enquire, how either the church at Corinth, or any other church today, can have "Knowledge of God?" To this query I reply; that there are only two ways by which a knowledge of Jehovah can be obtained by his creatures. One is, through the book of Nature; and the other through the book of Revelation. The book of nature unfolds her works manifold and wondrous. They are all above and beyond our finite comprehension; yet they all unitedly speak forth in one grand chorus—"The hand that made us is Divine." This, the first volume given to man for his instruction, deals only with the visible, and that which may be demonstrated to our senses. Its circle encompasses only the temporal. But, the second volume gives to man for his instruction and betterment, searches out above and beyond the temporal—the present, and unfolds to us the yet to come,—the Eternal, in his purposes toward our race! These facts were know to Paul, and to the church in that day, as well as they are today; although they may not have found expression after this formula; yet it is on this fact that Paul bases his remark when he says, "Some have no knowledge of God, I speak this to move you to shame." Then in verse 35 he says—"But some will say, how are the dead raised? and with what manner of body do they come?" To this query Paul replies "Thou foolish one; that which thou thyself sowest, is not quickened except it die. And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare again; it may chance of wheat or of some other kind. But God giveth it a body even as it hath pleased him, and to each seed, a body of its own."

Note here, that in this presentation of the simplest work of nature-seed-sowing, Paul seeks to impress upon the mind that it is of God, that it is his Divine power, that though unseen, and beyond our finite comprehension, works it all out according to the pleasure of his own will.

Then to the doubting Corinthians, Paul the beloved disciple turns another page of the book of Nature, and therein presents different kinds of flesh in the animal kingdom, showing that each kind is adapted to its own peculiar office or sphere, and is there retained by the power of the All Wise. Then he mounts a step higher, and asserts, "There are also celestial bodies and bodies terrestrial; but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another." They are each one kept distinct from the other, by the power of God. Not by their own power, nor by chance or fate. Then he reaches out, and points them to the highest, and grandest, of all visible glory, and says, "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory." In this the largest and most wondrous page in the entire book of nature, we behold the framing of an Omnipotent hand, telling in language that cannot be gainsaid, It is all of God. And, So also, is the resurrection of the dead! It is all of him, who has called all the visible creation into being, and who has given us assurance of a resurrection by leading forth his only begotten Son from the death state. He lived, died, was buried, and rose again from the dead, by, or through the power of God. The clause "So also" has no reference to the sowing of grain, or to its progressive growth to perfection. Paul directed the Corinthian church to God, that they might know him through his visible creation; and as they must admit that it is all of God, "So also" is the resurrection of the dead. That which we behold is all of him. So also is that which is yet to be revealed; even the calling back to life of those who have long slept in their dusty beds, as he called forth his Holy One, before he saw corruption.

Paul makes no attempt to explain how the resurrection takes place. He calls their attention to the various manifestations of Omnipotent power in the visible creation, how that come into being, and is sustained in all its multitudinous forms and its endless mysterious operations, by a supreme over-ruling Power. And in confidence unfaltering and glorious hope of immortality, brought to light through the resurrection of Christ, he assures them that it also is of God. All the wondrous works that he has called their attention to are of God, and "So also is the resurrection of the dead" [of God]! "It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption, it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; it is sown a physical body, it is raised a spiritual body." In these verses Paul refers to two actions and only two, and they are represented in opposition, one to the other. The first set (sown) refers to the first operation performed on the dead, and the second set (raised) to the second action performed on the same dead.

In the use of language we must be governed by the standard set up by our best Lexicographers. (Note.—The author of Anastasis sets up his own standard, both in translation and the use and import of very many words of the English language; and that standard is in direct opposition to our best translators and lexicographers; as also to the plain and positive teachings of Inspiration.) Our best authorities define the word "sow" "To scatter as seed upon the earth, to plant by strewing, to plant in any way." They define plant "to put in the ground as seed for growth. Now to sow it to plant, and to plant is to put in the ground and cover." The word sown as used in the text, is the past participle of the verb sow, and combined with the neuter verb is, forms the passive form of the verb is sown, referring to an action completed. Surely no one will deny that Paul in saying "it is sown in corruption" refers to the dead. What does he affirm of the dead? Changing the phraseology a little, but strictly retaining the sense we express it. The dead are put into the ground and covered while in a corruptible condition. They are raised, or brought out of the ground in an incorruptible condition. Neither sowing nor planting, can be Scripturally or logically, made to signify taking or casting out of the ground. To put such a construction on this portion of Holy Writ, is to bid defiance to all acknowledged laws of language; as well as to violate the obvious import of the language of inspiration.

The next act mentioned as being performed upon the dead is thus expressed. "It is raised in incorruption." Now what does the word "raised" as here used, signify? As used in this text, the Greek word is egeiro and means to raise up. Let us note in what sense this clause is used in the Scriptures in other cases, and then surely we will have ascertained the correct import of the words in this instance. In Luke vii. 22 Jesus said "Go your way and tell John what things ye have seen and heard. the blind receive their sight, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised up." When he, Christ raised Lazarus from the dead the same word in the original is found, also when he brought to life or raised the son of the widow who dwelt at Nain. The work of raising was completed when they were brought back to life. The same word "egeiro" is in the original of all these several cases. There is neither "stage" nor "process" about it. There is no such thought conveyed in the original, neither is there in the English.

No intelligent person who carefully and free from preconceived notions, reads 1 Cor. xv. and who understands the rudimentary principles of agriculture, as grain raising, can for a moment give their consent to such an application of science to Scripture illustration. 1st, because there is no analogy, and there is no analogy because the sowing and the raising of grain is according to the fixed and undeviating laws of nature, and nature is "The existing system of things, the aggregate of known causes and effects" etc. The combined causes of seed, earth, air, moisture, and sunshine; produce the effect—new grain. The resurrection of the dead is not according to any law, or combined system of laws of nature. Neither does the book of nature unfold to us in all her multitudinous works, any law with reference to resurrection. Nature in her loftiest heights unfolds to man nothing beyond this life any more than she does to any other branch of the animal kingdom. Nature does not now present, and never has presented any hope beyond the grave. The book of nature closes her volume in the dust of earth; and all the dews, and rains, and sunshine of heaven; avail not to resurrect that dust! Jehovah has decreed that combined influences shall periodically resurrect the vegetable world. No such influences operate upon our race.

If we live according to his will and die, having faith in his promise of the life to come, by his Almighty power will we be called forth from the dust of earth to life immortal.

2nd, Paul did not try to present any analogy because he well knew that none existed. He knew that if the vital principle were not still in the grain, and buried in the earth, that no amount of air, moisture, and sunshine would cause it to spring forth and grow. He also knew that the vital principle, the result of faith in Christ, was not buried with the saint, but hid with Christ in God. That it is there treasured up, not to be manifested till he who is our life shall appear. Then shall we also appear with him in glory. And 3d, in this chapter 1 Cor. xv. Paul leads the church of Corinth, and through them all succeeding churches to look upon the wondrous works of Jehovah as being all of him.

The four separate points that he makes in speaking of resurrection prove conclusively that he made no reference to grain raising as illustrating the resurrection. 1st It (the dead) is sown in corruption it is raised in incorruption. 2nd It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory. 3d It is sown in weakness, it is raised in power. 4th It is sown a physical body, it is raised a spiritual body.

In the sowing and raising of grain there is no such contrasting conditions; and Paul did not try to present any analogy because he well knew that none existed. He knew that if the vital principle were not still in the grain, and buried in the earth, that no amount of air, moisture, and sunshine would cause it to spring forth and grow. He also knew that the vital principle, the result of faith in Christ, was not buried with the saint, but hid with Christ in God. That it is there treasured up, not to be manifested till he who is our life shall appear. Then shall we also appear with him in glory. And 3d, in this chapter 1 Cor. xv. Paul leads the church of Corinth, and through them all succeeding churches to look upon the wondrous works of Jehovah as being all of him.

The four separate points that he makes in speaking of resurrection prove conclusively that he made no reference to grain raising as illustrating the resurrection. 1st It (the dead) is sown in corruption it is raised in incorruption. 2nd It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory. 3d It is sown in weakness, it is raised in power. 4th It is sown a physical body, it is raised a spiritual body.

In the sowing and raising of grain there is no such contrasting condition; and Paul told the Corinthians this fact before hand, for in speaking of the raising of wheat and other grain he says verses 37 and 38, "but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to each seed a body of its own, by which expression we must certainly understand a body of its own kind; or like it. Like the one that was sown. Then when he speaks of the resurrection body he shows that in four separate and distinct places, the resurrection body differs from the one that was shown or buried.

Paper cover, former price, 50c.; now 25c. Friends, you who are at work in the Master's vineyard, think of this chance offered you from week to week to get the book that gives the foundation of our hope in the clearest manner possible, for so little money. It is not right for these books to remain long on our shelves. There is work for them all over the land. "Key Words" is another work by the same author, former price 25c.; now 13c.; and "Thanatopsis," former price 10c.; now 5c.

Have you any smart infidels in your neighborhood? Do they sneer at and ridicule your views of the Bible? If you have we have a little work here that will aid you in routing them completely, and if you have none near you now you can scarcely stir many miles without meeting one, and if you are posted in their theories you have already won half of the battle. Sister Reed's little book, "Creation vs. Evolution" is the work we refer to, and all should possess a copy. Price 25c.

Our lamented Brother Magruder's "Reply to Ingersoll" is another book that should be more largely circulated. It is just what its name indicates—a Reply to Mr. Ingersoll—a reply that Mr. Ingersoll or any other infidel will not even try to answer, so it stands, for its foundation is laid in God's holy word. Price 50c.

The Gift of Life Eternal through Jesus Christ is the great subject for us. Eternal Life a Free Gift. Brother J. H. Pettengill has written a book on this subject, and all who read it say the work is well done. We can send you a copy for $1.00.

We write and talk much of the Kingdom and its Restoration. Brother Silas Henn has written a book on this subject that will aid us very much in our study of the Kingdom and the wonders of the Restoration. One dollar will place it on your table.

There have been different ages and dispensations in the past—we live now—there is an Age to Come, and Bro. Weather has told us in his work on this subject, the result of his life-time's search as to the nature and the proximity of the age coming hereafter. This is a large book of over 500 pages. Price $3.00.

Space will not admit of mention of half what our shelves contain. The Emphatic Diaglott, by B. Wilson; Atheism and Theism, by J. G. Wilson; Bible Triumphant, by Mrs. H. V. Reed; Christ's Kingdom, Where is it and What is it? by Jos. Lasier; A Translation of Matthew's Gospel, by Chas. Gardner; that grand work, A Letter to a Friend, by Mrs. Woodruff; Which is Right? or Is Christ's Throne in Heaven or on the Earth? by Thos. Wilson; When Shall These Things Be? by H. Bowman; A Letter to a Baptist Minister, by Daniel Heward; the Doctrine of Baptism, besides a host of those little silent leaflets that work all the time. When you are resting, being wearied, they keep on. Who will help circulate these books? They are all good. There may be an isolated expression that some might object to, but the teaching in the main is endorsed by all our best writers and thinkers. We are ready to fill your orders. See advertisements in other parts of this paper.

REMEMBER

That we will send THE RESTITUTION to the poor, at their request, so long as we can get the means to publish the paper. Let all our brethren who have means to use in sending the good news to others, send us the name of some friend or relative, and send us an extra dollar, to send the paper to them. If you cannot think of any such persons send the money, and we will apply it where it will be appreciated and return blessings on the donor.

A Time for All Things.

Timeliness is as important as Success. The right thing may become wrong unless it is in the right time. Look well to the time of doing anything. There is a time for all things. Choose the right time for saying things. If your wife looks wearied and worn out, be sure it is not the right time to tell her that the dinner is not hot, or that the bread is sour. Comfort her, cheer her up. Use the ten thousand little stratagems you were wont to handle so skillfully in the old days, to bring out the smiles about her lips.

If you are annoyed or vexed at people, just remember it is not the right time to speak. Close your mouth—shut your teeth together firmly, and it will save you many a useless and unavailing regret, and many a bitter enemy. If you happen to feel a little cross,—and who among us does not at some time or other?—do not select that time for reproving your noisy household flock. One word spoken in a passion will make a scar that a summer of smiles can hardly heal over.

If you are a wife, never tease your husband when he comes home, weary, from his day's business. It is not the right time. Do not ask him for expensive outlays when he has been talking about hard times. It is, most assuredly, the wrong time. If he has entered upon an undertaking against your advice, do not seize on the moment of his failure to say, "I told you so!" In fact, it is never the right time to use those four monosyllables.

Oh, if people only knew enough to discriminate between the right time and the wrong, there would be less domestic unhappiness, less silent sorrow, and less estrangement of heart! The greatest calamities that overshadow our lives have sometimes their germ in matters apparently as slight as this. If you would only pause, reader, before the stinging taunt, or the biting sneer, or the unkind scoff passes your lips,—pause just long enough to ask yourself, "Is it the right time for me to speak?" you will shut the door against many a heartache. The world hinges on little things, and there are many more trivial than the right time and the wrong.

Or, A Scriptural View of the Second Coming of Christ, with the Wonderful Signs that will Precede it, and the still more Wonderful Things that will follow it.

—BY SILAS HENN.—

NOTICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS:

The book is truthful, reverent and instructive, every way worthy of the attention of those who prefer calm argument to sensational speculation.—The Rainbow.

We are desirous to express our sympathy with the general scope of the book, and to bespeak for it a wide and cordial reception.—The Messenger.

The volume before us is evidently the product of a thoughtful mind, and deserves the careful study of every Christian, being of a very comprehensive character, and based on Scripture. Certainly it is the best work on the subject which has come under our notice.—The Sydney Observer.

The treatment shows that the author has studied well and patiently digested his theme before writing upon it, and we feel as we read page after page, stimulated rather than clogged in our inquiry.....The aim of the volume before us is to set the truth clearly before the mind, and so restore to its place in the consciousness of the church the hope that was once so dear to God's suffering saints, and is still so to many, but which is always unwelcome to a wealthy, gaid and formal church, and hated by the world. This little volume will be received and read with pleasure by all who take interest in prophetic subjects.—New Testament Illust. D. D.

"NOT AS I WILL."

Blindfolded and alone I stand,
With unknown thresholds on each hand.
The darkness deepens as I grope,
Afraid to fear, afraid to hope;
Yet this one thing I learn to know
Each day more surely, as I go,
That doors are opened, ways are made,
Burdens are lifted or are laid
By some great law unseen, and still,
Unfathomed purpose to fulfil,
"Not as I will."

Blindfolded and alone I wait,
Love seems too bitter, pain too late;
Too heavy burdens in the load,
And too few helpers in the road;
And joy is weak, and grief is strong,
And years and days so long, so long;
Yet this one thing I learn to know
Each day more surely, as I go,
That I am glad the good and ill
By changeless laws are ordered still,
"Not as I will."

"Not as I will"—the sound grows sweet
Each time my lips the words repeat;
"Not as I will"—the darkness feels
More safe than light, when this thought steals
Like whispered voice to calm and bless,
All unrest and all loneliness:
"Not as I will"—because the One
Who loved us first and best, has gone
Before us on the road, and still
For us must all his love fulfil.
"Not as I will."

THE KINGDOM. No. 5.

The language in which the kingdom is promised, in every passage where the promise is found, is so plain and distinct, that none but a visible kingdom, the restoration of David's throne, can fulfil the promise; and any spiritualizing of the language, is to do violence to the grammatical sense. The language is so plain and definite that Jewish hopes and expectations were built upon it from David down to the time of Christ; and from the same language, together with the additional promises of the New Testament, the primitive church cherished the same hope. The force of this fact is overlooked; by a great many preachers and writers it is ignored; it is not convenient for them to face it; it is utterly opposed to their spiritualizing ideas; it places them in a difficulty from which they cannot escape. Now we contend that men inspired by the Holy Spirit could not uniformly use language which plainly teaches the restoration of David's kingdom, if no such kingdom was meant, but only a spiritual one. The sacred writers [illegible] they speak honestly and [illegible]ings which God revealed [illegible] which the Jews [illegible] kingdom in the time [illegible]te strengthened by the [illegible]ning of the apostles. Never once did they inform them that they misapprehended the nature of the kingdom; they never told them that the kingdom was not a literal but a spiritual one, and that David's throne did not mean David's throne, but the throne of the Father in heaven; for the fulfilment of the covenant made with Abraham and David, and the promises made to the nation. If their hopes of the restoration were without foundation, they left them in their error. The very things they needed to have told them, and ought to have told them, if the present theory of the kingdom is the true one, they never so much as hinted at. No; but they deepened their impressions and raised their expectations of the setting up again of the throne of David.

After receiving the baptism of the Spirit at the Pentecost, Peter preached "the times of restoration of all things," and connected that restoration with the second advent of the Christ; and as a confirmation of the declaration, added that God had spoken of this "by the mouth of his holy prophets." The apostles, therefore, preached the kingdom, a literal restoration of the Davidic kingdom. The church of that age so understood it and so believed it; the church of the second century believed and maintained the same; the church of the third century continued in the same faith until Origen set up a system of reading into the Word allegorical and spiritual meanings. These are facts which can be abundantly verified by history; and they are facts which the upholders of a spiritual kingdom find to be troublesome things. With their theory, they can give no satisfactory reasons for the general prevalence of the view that prevailed in the early church in reference to the kingdom. It is not admissible that the Holy Ghost-inspired teachers of Christianity would have seen all their hearers holding a fundamental error, and have not corrected it; nay, so far from correcting it, actually confirming them in it. Some errors into which they fell are corrected, and the record furnishes evidence of this; but not even a hint is given to show that they were in error in expecting the restoration of the kingdom. The things upon which they needed special instruction were—the things upon which the Christian rather needed special instruction were, the postponement of the kingdom through their not receiving Jesus as the promised Messiah, and their absolute need of repentance and faith and their acceptance of the Christ as a preparation for the covenanted inheritance. The most serious reflection is due to these matters before our view of the kingdom is pronounced unscriptural. We are persuaded that this is the only view that harmonizes with the teaching of the Old and the New Testaments.

It is the early and long-continued faith of the Jewish people in the restoration of the kingdom that has kept them from being lost in other nations. They have, all through the ages of their dispersion, believed that the Davidic throne would be set up again; that they would become a nation settled in the land of their fathers; that as a nation they would excell all others in greatness and glory; and it is this belief that has held them up and preserved them as a distinct people among all other peoples. And this faith has come through their knowledge of Old Testament prophecy, according to the literal and grammatical meaning of the language.

In looking at the prophecies predicting the kingdom of the Messiah, and seeing clearly portrayed the restoration of the Davidic throne, and the wonderful and wide-spread blessings connected therewith, and then looking at the Christian church, and the state of things existing in connection with it, the Jews of course see a very marked disparity. They see that the latter does not, in any proper sense of the word, fulfil the conditions and requirements of the former: and taking the common view to be the view set forth by Christianity, they discard the religion of the New Testament as an imposition. Doubtless many who still remain in unbelief would be led to receive Jesus as the Messiah, if the harmony of New Testament teaching with the Old was clearly set before them. How great is the responsibility resting upon teachers and preachers to re-examine this subject. One man's thoughts have ran too much in the same groove as those of another; and one class of teachers and preachers have followed too closely their predecessors. We need to study the Bible more carefully, and ask, not what the creeds say, but what the prophets say, what the evangelists say, what the apostles say, what the Great [illegible]ys. Theories which are based on isolated texts, or on mere inferences, or which have no authority higher than the statement of some theologian, should be regarded with suspicion and subjected to the test of God's word. The day is speedily approaching when all beliefs not founded on the Book will be swept away.

SILAS HENN.

A DISCLAIMER.

"Be patient toward all men." 1 Thess. v. 14.

Dear ones of the household of faith, we are exhorted by Paul to be patient in all things, to be patient in tribulation also; knowing that tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts. I, for some years, have tried to be patient, and for the last few years have had my patience severely tried, but, thank God, I have let patience have her perfect work and I am enabled to say, Father, forgive them.

Since I have lived in Michigan a report got out that I did not believe in the resurrection of infants, and therefore my influence was crippled in the State. So I take this method of stating that that is not true. I am a firm believer in the resurrection of that class, for I have, to my mind, proof of that. See Jer. xxxi. 15–17, They (the children) shall come again from the land of the enemy. Again in Rev. xx., the small and great will stand before the Judge. I have never given any intimation, either in public or private, that I disbelieved in the resurrection of children, but have preached upon the subject of the resurrection of the infantile race. I have five dear children in the death-state, and I believe they will come forth in God's good time. So I am in hopes these few lines will set this matter right with all the dear ones.

Then again I am accused of being a "Josephite." Now, dear brethren, if there has anything come up among us that I do dislike, it is that doctrine that Jesus is the son of Joseph. I have had two sisters to write to me from Illinois to give them the proof that Christ was the Son of God and not so. A few days ago I got a letter from one of our dear sisters of Michigan, and a sister I do respect and love as a dear sister in the like precious faith. She says to me, Brother Hatch, I hear you are a "Josephite" and I can hardly believe it; but the report is out here to that effect (or to that amount). Now, says she, I want to hear from you. So I wrote her that it was false.

Now dear ones, I am not prepared to deny my Lord. I believe as Peter did, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." And Christ did not tell him, Peter, you are mistaken, I am the son of Joseph, but sanctioned what Peter said; and there is plenty of evidence of his being the Son of God. When in the temple, at twelve years of age, he says, know ye not that I must be about my Father's business? Now if Joseph was his father, in the sense that the "Josephites" have it, then he was contracting a job of carpenter work for Joseph. But no, he was about his Heavenly Father's business. Dear brethren, I for one, have no love for the "Joseph" theory. I have been greatly misrepresented in many places by false brethren, but dear brethren, I do not harbor any malice against them. God forgive them, and I pray they may repent of that wrong and may they and I meet in the kingdom of God's dear Son is my prayer for Jesus' sake. Now dear ones when anyone that does not read THE RESTITUTION asks you about my belief, tell them I never did believe the Joseph theory and never can with God's book before me.

O dear ones, let us all drop those untaught questions and let us teach more love, love to God, and love to our fellow man—yes, love for those outside of the church of God. If we would spend more of our time in trying to save sinners, and less time on these hobbies, it would be better for us all, better for the cause of God, better for the dear ones out of Christ. O think of it dear brethren, and do as Paul says, "Let us judge one another no more, but judge this rather that no man put a stumbling block or an occasion to fall in his brother's way." May the dear Lord help us to be up and doing.

A few weeks ago I was near my end, as I thought, but the good Lord spared my life for which I am thankful, and God being my helper I will try to do all the good I can and as little harm in this world as possible. Dear brethren of like precious faith, pray for me that I may be found ready when the dear Lord shall come. So, in conclusion, dear ones, I am a firm believer in the resurrection of the dear children as well as of God's saints. In fact I believe all that God has said about it, and I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God. I believe what the angel Gabriel says about it. I believe that Mary told the truth about the matter when she said, I know not a man. I believe that Joseph had the truth revealed to him when he was a mind to put her away privately, for I believe the angel of God when he said, "Fear not Joseph to take to thee Mary, thy wife, for that holy thing that is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost." I believe the power of the Highest overshadowed her and the Holy Spirit came upon her. Now dear ones is this "Josephism"? O let us have more of the love of God in our minds. God is love. God so loved the world. Thank God for the love he has manifested towards poor, fallen man. O for more love, more patience, more self-denial, more energy, more zeal for the cause of God, is my prayer.

J. S. HATCH.

ARE WE IN THE FAITH?

Paul in writing to the Corinthian brethren, says, "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves." 2 Cor. xiii. 5. In studying the Bible, we find many such exhortations, and we are led to ask ourselves the question, are we in the faith? For Paul says "there is one faith, one hope and one baptism." Eph. iv. 5. And again we read, "We are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus." Gal. iii. 26. "Now the just shall live by faith, and if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him." Heb. x. 38. Faith seems to be one of the qualities each must possess before he can please God, for we read that "without faith it is impossible to please God," Heb. xi. 6; and Jude in his exhortation to them that are called, says, "I exhort you that ye should earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints," Jude 3.

Now what was the faith once delivered to the saints? and what are we to have faith in? Is it in the gospel? Jesus told his disciples "to have faith in God, for verily I say unto you that whosoever shall say unto this mountain, be thou removed and be thou cast into the sea, and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that these things he saith shall come to pass, he shall have whatsoever he saith; therefore I say unto you, whatsoever things ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them." Mark xi. 22–24.

Jesus is here trying to teach his disciples what they could do if they had faith. But some will say there is no need of removing mountains now. Was there any need at that time when this was said? Are there no unbelievers now? I think there is a great deal of false teaching and infidelity at the present time. We read of Jesus saying to his disciples, "Why are you fearful, O, ye of little faith." Matt. x. 26. What would he say if he should come to this generation? Would he say there was no need of miracles or signs to show who are letting their light shine? "We should let our light so shine before men that they may see our good works and glorify our Father which is in heaven." Matt. v. 16 In the commission given to the apostles we read that signs shall follow them that believe. We do not see any signs today given and why is it? I think we believe the gospel, but we do not put our trust in God, we live too much in our own strength. Some will say we have not the faith; we must do as the disciples did, ask the Lord to increase our faith. And Peter says, "Add to your faith, virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance patience, and to patience godliness, and to godliness brotherly kindness, and to brotherly kindness charity." 2 Peter i. 5–7. We must first have faith and then add the Christian graces, and thus grow in grace and knowledge to obtain an abundant entrance in the kingdom.

O that we may have faith enough to rely on God at all times. Surely the end is near, for Jesus said, nevertheless when the Son of man cometh will he find faith on the earth? We have been reading a book published by H. L. Hastings, entitled "Ebenezers." We think it very good. Some had their prayers answered that did not seem to understand the gospel, but in reading the Scriptures we find Jesus caring for those who knew little about his mission. They believed him to be the Son of God, and he cured them according to their faith. He is the same Jesus today he was then; he is making intercession for us, and if we abide in him and his words abide in us, we shall ask what we will and it will be done unto us. John xv. 7. Then can we say of a truth we belong to the body of one faith, the children of Abraham, for he is the father of the faithful.

Yours in hope,

CLARA CROWN.

THE COMING AGE,

—ITS—

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WEETHEE.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar forces, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the most approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that the supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth Price $2.00. Send to this office for this work.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXV. Read PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JUNE 9, 1886. NO. 22.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and six Months at the same rate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint helps with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and baptism as pre-requisite to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM.
No. 5.

The literal Israelitish character of the kingdom of God, is sought to be set aside, and a so-called "spiritual" kingdom substituted in its place, by the words addressed by our Lord to Pilate—"My kingdom is not of this world," John xviii. 36. It is urged from this statement that the LOCALITY of the kingdom cannot be on the earth, or IN this world, but must be either located in some distant sphere, or else be a pure matter of mental or spiritual influence, altogether apart from any particular area in the great universe of the Creator.

Notice, first, that our Lord did not say "My kingdom is not IN this world;" or "shall not be in this world." If he had used any such terms as these the case might have been different. On the contrary the terms he does employ are capable of being understood in entire harmony with the existence of his kingdom IN this world, or upon this earth UNDER the whole heaven, and not in any other sphere.

Nothing is more indisputable than the dependency of our Lord's words to express the ORIGIN or SOURCE of the AUTHORITY and POWER of his kingdom. Take a case in point. Our Lord said to the chief priests, scribes, and elders of Israel, who had challenged his authority for teaching, etc. "I will also ask you one thing; and answer me—The baptism of John, was it from heaven, or of men?" Now it so happens that the terms "from heaven" and "of men" are identical in construction with the phrase "of the world," used by our Lord. And there cannot be a doubt that they were meant to express the SOURCE of the AUTHORITY for John's baptism. The rendering "from" in the phrase "from heaven" is more expressive of the original than the rendering "of" in the phrase "of men." The original is not in the simple genitive of the nouns "heaven," "men," and "this world." The very important and expressive preposition ek is used in all three cases. The literal reading would be "out of heaven"—"out of men,"—"out of this world." And the full reading in John xviii. 36, would therefore be "My kingdom is not out of this world"—that is, plainly, "not FROM this world," in the sense of its deriving its authority and power not from a human, but from a higher source.

I may mention that a glance at Hudson's "Critical and English Concordance" shows that ek or eks is rendered "out of" about 70 times in the four gospels; and about as often "from." The baptism of John was "from heaven" in the sense that John was Divinely commissioned to baptize, not by any means in the sense that the water employed in baptizing was provided, in some special manner, in the physical or material sense, from heaven. And so the future Divine kingdom shall be established by Divine authority, and not by any authority derived in any sense from this world.

This is confirmed by our Lord's words immediately following those under consideration—"If my kingdom were of this world (ek tou kosmou toutou—out from this world) then would my servants fight that I should not be delivered to the Jews." This is as if he had said—If my kingdom were to be established by the same means, and according to the same principles as "the kingdom of men," then should I, the Sovereign, raise an army, (my servants) and by the power of the sword, in the hands of mortal men, put down the Roman power which you, Pilate, represent, and establish my authority in its place. And he added still further—"But now is my kingdom not from hence." That is, you Pilate, do not see any signs of such means being put in operation; it must therefore be evident to you that my kingdom is not, at least at this present time, out from this world.

I may also notice here that the radical sense of ek or eks given in Liddell and Scott's Greek Lexicon is "from out of;" and meaning III., is "of origin to be born or sprung from one."

It is worthy of note also that the Latin and French versions bear out the sense plainly derived from the original Greek—the Latin exactly representing the terms already quoted. The Latin has, "Regnum meum non est ex hoc mundo;"—while the French has, "Mon regne n'est pas de ce monde." It will be observed that the Latin has ex while the French has de.* The fact is that the French, not having the preposition ex, has given the nearest to the sense of the Greek in using de, which means of or from.* The Hebrew version of the New Testament exactly agrees. The word for eks is MIN from, apart from.

The declared facts of the past history of the kingdom of God, and the predictions as to its future establishment on the earth, which have been already referred to, are in strict accordance with these words of our Lord to Pilate, and may just be briefly noted here. Christ's kingdom is the kingdom of God; and it is by Divine power it is to be established, when the Lord God Almighty takes to him his great power and reigns," the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord (that is Jehovah) and of his Christ (that is, Anointed One). This takes place according to the Scriptures when "the seventh angel has sounded" and at "the time of the dead that they should be judged, and reward bestowed on the servants of God, and the destroyers of the earth destroyed." Rev. xi. 15, 18. In view of these and many other similar testimonies, does any one seriously imagine that when the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of the Messiah, those kingdoms are transported to another planet, or cease to have a certain outward national existence on this earth? The vision of the prophet showed that nations and kingdoms in their corporate capacity shall be subjected to the rule of the Christ and his saints—"I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven....and there was given him dominion and glory and a kingdom, that all people and nations and languages should serve him." Dan. vii. 13, 14. And this according to verse 27 "under the whole heavens." And yet this shall be a kingdom "not out from this world," but a "kingdom of the heavens," because "set up" by "the God of heaven," Dan. ii. 44, and governed by his righteous laws administered by his Son, "the Lord from heaven."

We have a remarkable illustration of the perfect possibility of being in this world and yet "not of this world." He said, speaking of his disciples, "I have manifested thy name unto the men whom thou gavest me OUT OF THE WORLD."..."And NOW I AM NO MORE IN THE WORLD, but THESE ARE IN THE WORLD, AND I COME TO THEE."....While I WAS WITH THEM IN THE WORLD, I kept them in thy name."... "And now I come to thee."....I have given them thy word, and the world hath hated them, BECAUSE THEY ARE NOT OF THE WORLD, even as I AM NOT OF THE WORLD." I pray not that thou shouldst take them OUT OF THE WORLD, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil. THEY ARE NOT OF THE WORLD, even as I AM NOT OF THE WORLD," John xvii. 6, 11, 16. From these statements it is plain that our Lord and his Apostles were "in the world," and at the same time "not of the world." Why, therefore, seeing that precisely similar language is used, may not his kingdom be in "this world," and at the same time be "not of the world?"

Another passage which is often used to support the idea that the kingdom of God is in the heart, and has no external corporate constitution, is Luke xvii. 21. "The kingdom of God is within you." Those who use this argument altogether overlook the fact that these words are addressed to the Pharisees, who were the bitterest enemies of our Lord and rejectors of his teaching. As we are told, "the Pharisees and lawyers rejected the counsel of God against themselves, being not baptized of John. In his "Dictionary of the Bible," Dr. John Radie says regarding them, "Pride and hypocrisy were their prominent characteristics ....In many cases they made void the law of God by their superstitious observance of the commandments of men, and were the slaves of lust, avarice and pride. They were reproved by our Savior particularly for ostentation in their prayers and alms; for pride in dress, salutations, titles, broad phylacteries, and taking the highest seats at feasts, and in synagogues. On account of his detection of their hypocrisy, and his open denunciation of their crimes, they became almost universally the enemies of Christ."

Taking the Apostle Paul's definition of the kingdom as being "righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit," it seems scarcely credible that our Lord would virtually tell the Pharisees that these principles were "within them." This of itself is sufficient to condemn the common interpretation.

The answer of our Lord, however, to the "demand" of the Pharisees as to "when the kingdom of God should come," is not limited to the seven words quoted. Taken in its full extent it affords a complete refutation to the theory of the spiritualists. His answer was in these terms—"The kingdom of God cometh not with observation. Neither shall they say, lo here! or lo there! for, behold, the kingdom of God is within you." There is an important various reading given in the margin—"The kingdom of God is among you. Besides this, there is a possible alternative construction which would materially affect the sense of the entire answer. It is generally assumed that our Lord, after introducing certain supposed observers whom he represents as not having any occasion to say "Lo here! or Lo there!" continues his own direct answer in the words that follow—"for, behold, the kingdom of God is among you." But it has been suggested, with some force, that those latter words are not our Lord's direct reply but are a continuation of "Lo here! or Lo there!" On this supposition our Lord's direct answer is limited to the first clause—"The kingdom of God cometh not with observation."

I must say that this construction derives some support from the fact that the word rendered "behold" in the closing sentence is the same as that rendered "Lo" twice in the passage; and when this word is rendered uniformly throughout, the reader is in a better position to judge of the whole passage. The word is idou the imperative of eidoo, I see. Suppose we use the rendering "Lo" throughout, we should have "Lo here! for, Lo! the kingdom of God is among you;" or "Lo there! for, Lo! the kingdom of God is among you." Or take another rendering; "See here! for see! the kingdom of God is among you."

If this construction be sustained, the difficulty has no existence; for it is not our Lord's words, but those of some supposed sign-seekers, which create any need for explanation. Those sign-seekers are supposed to find something to be regarded as a sign of the existence of the kingdom, and to be proclaiming the supposed sign to those around them. On the construction suggested they are supposed to include in their proclamation the statement, "for, see! the kingdom of God is among you."

Supposing, on the other hand, that the common construction be adopted, a sufficient explanation is afforded by the following considerations. The Pharisees were naturally expecting to see some indications of the COMING of the kingdom which had been for several years the subject of public proclamation by Jesus and his apostles. Not observing these, they boldly put the question as to "when the kingdom of God should come?" Instead of a direct reply as to TIME, our Lord speaks of the MANNER of his coming. "The kingdom of God COMETH not with observation." This answer does not imply that when the kingdom has come it shall not be observable. Its COMING shall be instantaneous; "as the lightning when it lighteneth out of the one part under heaven shineth unto the other part under heaven, so shall the Son of man be in his day," vs. 23. There is no scope here for speculation as to signs of its approach, or for exclaiming, Lo here! or Lo there! And assuming the following clause to be part of the direct answer of our Lord, "for, behold, (before you are aware of it) the kingdom of God is among you." And as he said on another occasion, "As a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth." Luke xxi. 35.

I shall close this article by a reference to what was advanced in the first and second. I think from what has been submitted, the quotation from the Shorter Catechism, "What do we pray for in the second petition" (that is of the Lord's prayer) may be now safely left to the consideration of the reader. I would only remark that by comparing the several clauses of the answer with the alleged Scripture proofs appended it will be seen that there is no real relationship between the one and the other. The fact is that while the word "kingdom" occurs four times in the answer, it is not once mentioned in the five so-called proofs.

In view of these considerations, I submit that there is no difficulty in understanding that the kingdom of God proclaimed by our Lord and his apostles was the veritable kingdom of God, the theocracy which had previously existed in the Holy Land, and whose restoration was predicted by the prophets. Neither is it necessary to put a figurative interpretation upon the numerous passages in the Bible where this restoration is promised, whether in the New Testament or the Old. Take for example Luke i. 32, 33, "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his Father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." And this from Matt. xix. 28, "And Jesus said unto them, Verily I say unto you, That ye which have followed me in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

This could not have a fulfilment in the church; for although Jesus was exalted to his Father's throne in heaven, this is not "the throne of his glory" here spoken of. This is evident from another declaration by himself as to the time when he is to sit on the throne of his glory. "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory: and before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats." Matt. xxv. 31, 32. The throne of his glory is thus distinct from his Father's throne in heaven, and is not to be occupied by him till his second appearing. He distinguishes these two thrones in the promise given to John in Patmos when he says, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne." Rev. iii. 21. And again this throne and the sovereignty to be exercised upon it by the Christ and his saints over the nations of the earth is plainly referred to in another promise in Rev. ii. 25-29, "But that which ye have already hold fast till I come." And he that overcometh, and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers; even as I received of my Father. And I will give him the morning star." He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." Note that this is a promise to Jehovah's Anointed One recorded in the second Psalm; hence the words of Jesus, "even as I received of my Father."

"Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God;" for one of its fundamental elements is that it shall stand for ever, and it shall not be left to other "people." Those who shall be privileged to inherit this kingdom shall be made meet for it by becoming partakers of the Divine nature, incorruptible and immortal. The apostle Paul strikingly connects this transformation with the return of the Lord, "For our conversation is in heaven; from which also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ: who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself." Phil. iii. 20, 21. And John agrees with Paul, "It doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." 1 John. iii. 2.

The moral power of this hope, as a purifying influence, is a mighty incentive to the cultivation of that character so essential to the position of partakers with the Christ of his kingdom and glory. Thus John adds to the words just quoted, "And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." And the apostle in writing to the Hebrews, says, "Wherefore, we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear: for our God is a consuming fire." Heb. xii. 28, 29. Note here the word "receiving," not having received as it is so commonly understood. The past also supplies a powerful motive to holiness of life. "We love him because he first loved us." "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." "The love of Christ that constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead: and that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again." 2 Cor. v. 14, 15.

This transformation, both moral and spiritual, being completed at the second appearing of the Lord, the saints shall be honored with a share in the administration of his kingdom. As kings and priests they "shall reign on the earth" over Israel restored and the nations.

The question presents itself, Is there anything in such a kingdom to justify the term "Carnal" which some have applied to it? Is it not better entitled to be called a spiritual kingdom, if the term were allowable, than the Christian church, even in its best days? And infinitely more so than the so-called church of modern times?

And if our Lord and his apostles proclaimed the glad tidings of this future kingdom of God, how can modern preachers who do not believe in such a kingdom escape the condemnation of being "blind leaders of the blind?" And how should we, who profess to see, prize the precious privilege of "knowing the joyful sound" and seek to arrest the attention of our fellowmen to the gospel of this glorious kingdom?—Matt. xvi. 28; Mark ix. 1; and Luke ix. 27 in next paper.

J. Cameron.

*The French have evidently derived de from the Keltic, the language of the original Gaels as it does not exist in the Latin. It is, however, still extant in the Irish and Scotch branches of the Keltic as dh, the words in the latter being, "Cha'n ann do'n t-seopliat is tha sin riaghachdas."

JOSEPH PRIESTLEY.

Some men are great intellectually, some are morally great, and some are great in faith toward God and philanthropy. How few combine all the elements of greatness in their own person, but if any man in modern times has succeeded in making such a combination, that man was Joseph Priestley. To most people he is comparatively unknown. True, he is recognized in a sort of patronizing way by the scientific fraternity as "the father of modern chemistry," and there was some talk of erecting a monument to his memory when they celebrated his "centennial" some few years ago, but I think nothing came of the talk. Beyond the fact that, like Galileo, he unveiled to the world some facts that revolutionized the scientific theories of his day, he is not credited by his scientific successors with the genius he possessed, and is even referred to sometimes as a "religious fanatic."

This is the result, of course, of the present narrow system of "scientism" in which every scientist works and studies in his own laboratory and in his own rut, from which he ever and anon emerges to announce to the wondering world the discovery of a mare's nest, a "molecull," or some such seven days' wonder. Priestley, on the other hand, was a man among men, who took active and independent part in the questions of his day, expressing himself with a boldness that brought upon him the displeasure and persecution of the wicked and powerful. The literary works he has left behind him encompy about 28 volumes, 1 thick, and are a perfect mine of thought and an encyclopedia of knowledge. He was a correspondent of President Jefferson and an intimate of Benjamin Franklin, and his name was set down with George Washington's as an honorary "citizen of the Republic" during the first French Revolution.

I know that some readers will say, what is all this, what is human greatness, what are scientific attainments? Few people think less of "big names" than I do, but we all admire true greatness, whether in a Paul, a Washington, a Priestley, or a Gordon, for theirs was a greatness of which the name was the least part of it. This "religious" affectation of ignoring human greatness and despising human "leadership" has been exemplified to a remarkable degree during the last half century; sect after sect arose pompously affecting to take no stock in leaders, prominent among whom was the Christians or Campbellites, and the Christadelphians under the leadership of Dr. Thomas, and we may safely say that no sects of the many have boasted so much of their independence of human leaders, and none have more closely followed or rapturously admired them. The truth is, brethren, that human greatness is not to be belittled, and if we would learn to do right we must render honor where honor is due. If this had been done, our brother, S. Wilson, would never have read such an outrageously absurd inscription on the tombstone that he told us about in a late issue of THE RESTITUTION, where the late Dr. Thomas is spoken of as the discoverer of the "long lost faith of the apostles." The party who wrote the inscription probably believes what he wrote, but he either never heard of Joseph Priestley, or treated him with the customary contemptuous sneer that no good thing comes outside Christadelphianism.

The great truths of Christianity were not only known to Priestley, but were earnestly advocated by him; in fact he claims to have written more in point of volume on religious subjects than any living man of his time, besides preaching at his "meeting house" near Birmingham. He taught the restoration of Israel, the "gospel of the kingdom," the millennial reign of Christ, and the earth as the home of the saints." His exposure of the doctrine of the Trinity is such as only he, with his knowledge of the early history of Christianity and familiarity with the "dead languages," combined with a dauntless and comprehensive mind, could make.

In fact I know of no doctrine of any importance held by us as a people, that Joseph Priestly has not amplified to the fullest degree, with the sole exception of baptism, and even in that he allowed that immersion was the primitive mode. When you add to these facts that he lived and wrote a century ago, before and during the American Revolution, that he also sympathized with and expressed his sympathy with the cause of humanity against tyranny, both towards America and France, and for this reason, as well as the bitter animosity of the clergy against him and his "materialism," they burned his house over him and drove his family homeless and penniless to London, and eventually to America. On his account the mob rioted in Birmingham three days, looting and burning every man's premises that was known to be even a friend of his, as well as the meeting house where he "taught the word" every Sunday to the people. I say when we consider these things and with them the dauntless yet compassionate spirit he showed, even the meekness and humility of his beloved Master, the heart glows toward his memory with enthusiasm as we exclaim, here was one of "nature's noblemen." If it is attempted to be shown that the reformers of the present time are not indebted to Joseph Priestley, I, for one, refuse to believe it, for even his very mistakes (he made mistakes) have been followed with an exactness that means plagiarism. For his part he claims no originality, but with a humility that was part of his being, states his argument in a simple way, and when quoting from his predecessors gives credit where it is due.

On his removal to Pennsylvania he lived in comparative retirement, and died surrounded by his children and grandchildren, whom he called to the bedside and explained to them almost in his last words that death was an unconscious sleep, and he and they would wake up together in the morning no matter if they all "went to bed" at different times. His, in my opinion, is the only case where a great scientific mind in modern times has devoted itself to the cause of the gospel, and it shows us that the gospel of our God is adapted to the intellects of all, from the simplest and most childlike to the most erudite and exact scholarship. Yet though he may be considered all round as one of the greatest of men, even he is not worth worshipping from the simple fact that he, unfortunately, is dead. The times require that we should have a living head, and that we keep alive and to the front, emulating the greatness of the brave who were before us, picking up the "standard" from their loosened grasp where they fell, and bearing forward and still forward.

I think the paper is all that could be desired by the household of faith, holding forth the words of truth and soberness. The articles written by Sister Carrie Williams are so plain that by reference to the Scriptures I do not see how two conclusions can be drawn from them. Surely the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and that too in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye. This thought of itself is, or ought to be, enough to stimulate us to energetic action in the cause of truth.

Bro. Colgrove is a deep thinker, a good writer, and his articles are devoured with much relish, yet I think his application of the 144,000 of Rev. vii. and xiv. to the church is wrong. I do not say that I am right but my opinion is that the statement is literal, from the fact that 12,000 are selected from each of the 12 tribes, and they are all virgins. They have not been defiled, etc., i. e., they have not any of them ever belonged to other churches, which cannot be said of any Gentile church, they being selections from all denominations, so to speak. Now the Jews have never mixed in with any religious denomination, (that is the Jews as a people) hence they have not been corrupted, as John says they have not been. I understand that there is a general waking up among the Jews concerning Christ as the Messiah, and I have thought that just the 144,000 would accept Christ previous to his coming, so that their selection could be easily made as the first fruits unto God and the Lamb.

Praise the Lord from whom all blessings flow.

Palestine.

The Annual Report of the working of the Lionel de Rothschild School in Jerusalem by its Director, M. Marin Behar, is a highly interesting document. Ignorant persons who had met the establishment of the school with defiance and almost with hostility now regard the institution as the sole means of raising the Jews in their own estimation and in that of their fellow countrymen of other creeds. The interest in the school, particularly on account of the capital workshops in it, by no means confined to Jews. Every Sunday the establishment receives a constant succession of visitors, such as Greek, Armenian and Roman Catholic priests, Protestant clergymen and private individuals of every class and religion. Among the most frequent visitors are Hanif Pasha, the Governor of Jerusalem, the Greek Patriarch and the Chief of the Municipality. At the commencement of the present year the school was attended by 147 pupils, 97 of them being "apprentices," as the learners in the Technical Department are termed. These apprentices include a sprinkling of Mahomedans and Christians, one of the latter being a young American, son of a resident in the Holy City, who gives gratuitous instruction in the English language to the scholars generally.—The Occident.

SOMETHING GOING TO HAPPEN.

In another column will be found an extract from Messiah's Herald with the above heading. In the article allusion is made to several settlements in Palestine. One of these societies is located in Jerusalem. More than two years ago we received a letter from H. G. Spafford, one of the members of this society, setting forth their faith, expectations and principles, which we now, at this late date, place before our readers. It will be specially interesting at this time when read in connection with the article which we reprint. We give this letter in lieu of usual editorial.

JERUSALEM, Sept. 20, 1883.

Editor Restitution:

I am shown that I am to write you, giving you to know something of the Lord's dealing, during some seven years last past, with a little company, mostly Americans, of which I am a member, and who have now been here in Jerusalem almost two years.

I say "I am shown;" I mean I have been shown by the Lord. Seven years ago in August, the Lord began a supernatural work among us, and this has continued, without a day's intermission, up to the day and hour I write. I cannot in this letter go into detail. I can only testify that he graciously makes known to us his will, as precisely, as certainly, as we have any proof he ever did to Moses or Elijah, to Isaiah or Paul.

The possibility of this, by any one really believing the Scriptures, will not be denied. Joel ii. 28–32, with other Scriptures, speaks of the wonders which are to be wrought by the Holy Spirit in the last days. Isa. xxx. 20, 21 shows that those who "See their teachers" (i. e., who are of a wholly teachable and consecrated spirit) shall hear a word behind them saying, "This is the way, walk ye in it, when ye turn to the right hand and when ye turn to the left." If the privilege then of constantly knowing the will of the Lord is not enjoyed, it must be because of unsurrendered will, and not because of any unwillingness on the Lord's part to confer it.

Among the first things shown us in connection with this miraculous work of God among us, was the truth that there was no promise in the written word of bliss at death or at "the coming of the Lord," to any not then found in a state of complete submission to his will; having their wills wholly yielded to his will, with reference to every single thing that concerned them. That this state of complete consecration was not necessarily literal sanctification, but it was a perfect and unconditioned desire and determination to be made completely holy, no matter at what earthly cost. That the gospel of "salvation by conversion" was "another gospel," and not the Lord's gospel. That "salvation" meant bliss at death or "the coming of the Lord," and was not secured by mere conversion. That the truth typified in the sacrifices, the sin offering representing conversion, and the whole burnt offering representing consecration,—had almost wholly passed out of Christian minds. That no one could go to the temple with a thank or peace offering who had not tendered both the sin offering and the whole burnt offering; i. e., who were not merely converted but also consecrated. That the various terms, "faith," "belief," "believer," "disciple," "in Christ," "child of God," "begotten of God," "justified," "righteous," "friend of God," "salvation," etc., and all the promises connected with them, or predicated upon them, refer, not to conversion, but to consecration. That a person rendering a sin offering, and neglecting or refusing to render and maintain a whole burnt offering, had better never have rendered the sin offering, because sin thereafter became adultery and was to be judged as adultery and not merely as heathen uncleanness. That the theory that the conditions which awaited at death or "the coming of the Lord" the unconsecrated Christian and the consecrated Christian respectively, differed only with respect to the size of the reward, was wholly unscriptural; that instead the future punishment and sorrow were greatest in the case of the unfaithful Christian, he being the one punished with most stripes. That no matter how genuine one's sin offering, nothing but complete consecration of everything, time, taste, ambition, ease, money, everything to God, and this surrender maintained to the end, secured bliss at death or "the coming of the Lord."

Again, it has been shown us that the Bride, "the Lamb's wife," instead of being coextensive with the entire number of converted persons, is a very little company, composed only of those who follow "the Lamb whithersoever he goeth;" that this means following him through Gethsemane, judgment hall, the cross, and the grave, to resurrection life and power.

Again, we have been shown that the Mystic Babylon of Isaiah, Ezekiel and Revelation typifies the unfaithful elect throughout Christendom. That a person in any of the corporate churches, recognizing their confusion and corruption, their form of Godliness and denial of its power, is not now to remain within it, seeking to reform it, "putting away from among yourselves that wicked person" according to 1 Cor. v. 9–13. That that is not the rule upon which the true child of God is to act in these last days, but instead he is to act on the rule God has made upon this point for these last days, to-wit: to come out, to utterly separate himself, outwardly and spiritually, from the false wife, lest he be made a partaker of her sins and her plagues. Rev. xviii. 4; Isa. lii. 11; Jer. li. 6, 45.

Again, we have been shown that neither the doctrine of everlasting punishment and no probation after death, nor the doctrine of "conditional immortality" is Scriptural; that instead, God's love and mercy, enduring forever and seeking until the lost is found, will pursue and pursue until every created, responsible being, human and angelic, will have voluntarily accepted the righteousness and the salvation which are in Christ. That the aions are that portion of eternity during which is enacted the apostacy, redemption and restoration; that there was a time before the aions had yet begun; that there will be a time when the aions will cease. That when they cease, the condition of men and angels will not be that of a mere Adamic purity, but that of being clothed in the infallible righteousness of Christ, so making it true that where sin abounded, grace did much more abound, and securing through the impossibility of any renewed apostacy or rebellion, a rest indeed for God and his people forever. "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all" (not all men) "unto myself."

Again, we have been shown that the end of this dispensation is at the very doors. That there is to be a literal restoration of the land of Palestine and a literal return of the Jews. That that which awaits the world is a manifestation of the sons of God with power. That "the saints possess the kingdom," and that as the Son manifested the unseen Father, so the Bride will manifest to the world the unseen God. That the Bride will be ever in the presence of the Lord; that "the world" will have Christ manifested to them through the Bride.

In obedience to the voice of God which has taught us the above and many other truths, all of them in direct connection with the written word, two years ago a little company started from America for Jerusalem, there to wait upon the Lord. A very few, some six or seven persons, have joined us since we left America. The Lord sent us here, not to proselyte, but to be cleansed and taught, as Paul was sent into Arabia and Moses to Midian. He has taken us into a desert place apart, and here for two years he has been graciously teaching us concerning our own hearts, concerning himself, and of that which is shortly to come upon the earth. We know in whom we trust, and though our testimony be not now received, the day will declare it, and it will be known whether we be of God, or whether we speak of ourselves.

Your brother in the name and love of the Lord Jesus Christ,

H. G. SPAFFORD.

Waiting for Something to Happen.

Dr. O. R. Baobeler of the Free Baptist denomination writes to the Morning Star of this city a sketch of a visit he made a few weeks ago to the Holy Land. Returning as a missionary to India, he concluded on arriving at Port Said to "stop over for a fortnight, in order to take a few Bible lessons in Bible lands" and thus have his "dream of years realised." His description of the plain of Sharon and of the parties he met in Palestine, who are there waiting for "something to happen" in the religious world of an extraordinary, unprecedented character, is so interesting that we make the following extracts:—

"Jaffa is the port of Judea, and the most important town in the plain of Sharon. When the Israelites took possession of the mountains this plain was held by the Philistines on the South, the Phenicians in the centre, and the Syrians on the North. The descendants of these powerful tribes are still here, though shorn of their ancient prestige, absorbed in Mahomedanism long ago, and now known as Bedouin and Arabs. This plain of Sharon stretches from below Gaza nearly up to Beyrooth, more than a hundred miles long by from twenty to thirty broad. It is a rolling prairie, well watered, without forest trees,—a lime formation of vast fertility. The population is very sparse, and large tracts of fertile lands are used only for pasturage. Jaffa is surrounded by orange gardens, producing the best fruit in the world, it is said. These gardens are densely studded with trees, and the trees are loaded with fruit. Just now all the steamers load with oranges. A merchant from Hamburg, who is purchasing to send home, told me he was paying at the rate of a cent for four. Some of them are enormous. One I measured and found it in its largest circumference thirteen inches, and this was not the largest, I think.

"There is a German colony two miles out from Jaffa, which I wished to visit. . . . . They have purchased a thousand acres at about twenty dollars per acre, and have brought it into an excellent state of cultivation. Their fields are all green with wheat, barley and grass. The crops indicate about June though the trees show no sign of budding [about March 28]. The Germans were well-to-do farmers and mechanics at home, and they came here with their wealth for purchasing land, erecting houses and providing all the appliances necessary for a thrifty colony. Their streets are well laid out, houses of stone, most of them two stories. They have a wine manufactory, a steam grist mill, church and schoolhouses. While they live mainly on the produce of their fields and from their flocks and herds, their cash profits would seem to come mostly from the vintage. They have extensive vineyards and they purchase the grapes from the farmers around. Their wine sells at Jaffa for a dollar a gallon. Milk is worth ten cents a quart, butter thirty cents a pound and eggs ten cents a dozen. Arab farm labor rates are fifty cents a day. There are three of these German colonies in the Holy Land—two on the plains of Sharon, at Jaffa and Haifa, and one at Jerusalem, all highly prosperous in their agricultural interests. Of course, I asked the question, Why are you here? There answer was, 'For religious purposes,' and on pressing them for a more definite answer I found them giving expressions to a remarkable idea that has taken possession of other minds as well as theirs, that 'something is to happen,' here and that very soon.

"The history of this idea during the last twenty years is singularly interesting. About twenty years ago a colony of twenty families came from Maine and settled here at Jaffa. They had the impression that something was about to happen, and that their work would be here. They were swindled out of most of their property and the colony disbanded, some of them were sent home at Government expense. Nine of that party are still here, engaged mostly in assisting tourists. Five years later came the Germans with their colonies, of which I have now spoken, and with the same idea, 'something is to happen.' Then the Jews have been gradually coming, taking up land and starting flourishing settlements on a small scale. They, too, have the same general idea that 'something is to happen.' From one of them, an American Jew, living here at Jaffa, I got a more definite expression, that the Jewish Messiah is to appear in four years—in 1890. He will wait here till then and if something does not happen then, he will return to America. But what will he be and what will he do when he comes? said I. 'O, we know nothing about that. We must wait and see.'

"A still more remarkable party I met at Jerusalem. A number of American gentlemen and ladies, several from Chicago, business men and members of the churches, became impressed with the idea that 'something is to happen' here, and that they must have a share in it. They number about twenty persons; men women and children, have taken a large house where they live in one family, spending their time in religious exercises, but engaging in no one work whatever, either for their own support or for the good of others. They believe the time of work is past and that they have nothing to do but to wait for orders. They depend entirely on what friends may send them for support. One of their number assured me that for a hundred times they had been utterly without means, and yet the means had come before they had reached the point of suffering. I was at their Sabbath afternoon service in the large room of their own hired house, on the wall overlooking Calvary, just where the Jews stood as they read the inscription on the cross,—The King of the Jews.' They had a piano, well played, and 'songs and solos' well sung. A few intelligent Syrians had come in and one Greek priest. Several prayed and then their leader read and expounded several portions of the Scripture, and the service closed with a general shaking of hands and cordial greetings all around. Their leader Mr. Spafford of Chicago, gave me very freely their views in regard to what was soon to happen. He spoke of their remarkable experiences in following their impressions of duty, all tending to bring them together at Jerusalem, and there they are to wait for the Lord's appointed time. They believe that what is to happen is this: the present dispensation will come to an end, and in the new one which is to succeed the power of God will be manifest as it never has been before, and miracles will be the order of the day instead of being the exception, is now. Under that manifestation of Divine power the true Church will triumph over all that opposes, and the reign of Christ will be everywhere acknowledged.

"I should not omit to mention another illustration of this same idea. In one of the wards of the German 'Sisters' hospitals at Jerusalem I found three German women one of them seventy-three, the others near seventy. The lady in charge stated that they belonged to a party of women who had come from Germany with the impression that 'something was about to happen,' and that it was their duty to be on the spot. They had no means of support here, nor could they return to their own country. I do not pretend to offer any explanation of these remarkable coincidences, but only state the facts as I became acquainted with them."—Reprinted from Messiah's Herald.

HOW TO DESTROY THE BIBLE.

First get rid of all the copies in all the languages—here are 100,000,000 copies, say, of the Old and New Testaments in one book and in portions of the book—you must have all these piled together into a pyramidal mass and reduced to ashes before you can say you have destroyed the Bible. Then go to the libraries of the world, and when you have selected there every book that contains a reference to the Old and New Testaments, you must eliminate from every book all such passages; and until you have so treated every book of poetry and prose, excepting all ideas of grandeur and purity and tenderness and beauty for the knowledge and power of which poets and prose writers were indebted to the Bible—until you have taken all these from between the bindings and turned them into ashes, leaving the emasculated fragments behind—not until then have you destroyed the Bible. Have you done it, then?

Once more. Go to the courts of law, and, having fought out the decrees and codes, you must master every principle of law, and study what it may have derived from the Old and New Testaments, and have all such passages removed from the code of jurisprudence. You must then go through the galleries of art throughout the world, and you must slash and daub over and obliterate the noble figures that the genius of the artists has produced—not until then have you destroyed the Bible. Have you done it then? What next? You must visit every conservatory of music, and not until the world shall cease voluntarily as to its masters, not until then have you destroyed the Bible. Then you must visit the baptisteries of the churches, and from the baptismal roll you must erase all Christian names—the names of John and Mary—for they suggest the Scriptures, and the register is stamped with the Bible. Have you done it then? No, there is one copy of the Bible still living. It is the cemetery of the Christian. The cemeteries, while they exist, are Bibles, and to suppress the book, to let not a trace of it be discovered, you must pass from gravestone to gravestone, and with mallet and chisel cut out every name that is Biblical, and every inspiring passage of Scripture graven thereon. To destroy the Bible you must blot from the memory of every Christian its promises and comforts. Not until you have done all this can you destroy the Bible.—Dr. Guard.

Youth's Column.

The Delay.

Not worlds on worlds, in phalanx deep,
Need we to prove a God is here;
The daisy, fresh from winter's sleep,
Tells of his hand in lines as clear.

For who but he, who arched the skies,
And pours out day-spring's living flood,
Who works and dwells in mysteries,
Could rear the daisy's purple bud?

Mould its green cup, its wiry stem,
Its fringed border nicely spin,
And cut the gold-embossed gem
That sets in silver gleams within?

And clog it, unrestrained and free,
O'er hill, and dale, and desert sod,
That man, where'er he walks, may see
In every step the stamp of God?

Forgive Much.

"Very well," said the head of the firm, looking over the top of his glasses at the erect figure of the boy in front of his desk. "References all satisfactory. Will engage you from tomorrow morning as office boy. Be round early now and keep up to time."

He made a motion with his hand towards the door, but the boy lingered, twirling his well-worn cap in his hands.

"Please sir," he said at length, "I've a dog, a real clever little chap. Mother's out washing all day, and I don't know where to leave him. He follows me round everywhere, and if I should turn him out he might get lost. Would you mind, sir, if he sat in the entry while I was inside?"

It was a novel request for the new office boy to make, and the head of the firm frowned, but fortunately for the boy he was fond of dogs.

"Have you got the animal with you?" he inquired.

"Yes sir," was the eager answer, "right outside, sir."

He followed the boy out through the front office where three clerks were sitting writing busily.

The dog, a small Scotch terrier, was lying on the pavement, his bright eyes fixed on the door, patiently waiting for his master to come.

"He's not bad, not bad at all," said the head of the firm, surveying him critically. "You wouldn't want to sell him, now?"

"Please, sir," said the boy, flushing, "I'd a deal rather have Mop than the money he'd bring."

"Well, well," said the old gentleman, somewhat touched at the boy's evident devotion to his little favorite, "keep the dog and bring him every morning if he gives no trouble."

And so the matter was settled. How proud and happy Mop and his master felt as they ran home through the streets of the city that afternoon, to think that they had obtained the coveted position.

"I wonder, Mop," said the boy, what "Jim Elder will say when he hears about it. I guess he wanted the position most as bad as we did." And Mop wagged his tail as if to say he was glad they had been the successful candidates.

Suddenly the tall, ungainly figure of the subject of their thoughts loomed up before them with a dark scowl on his face.

"I say you, Nat Meadows," he commenced. "So I hear you've sneaked into that place. You knew I wanted it, and it was mighty mean—that's all I have to say. Everywhere, in school and out of it, you are always getting in my way."

He spoke with a mixture of despair and passion that was pitiful to see.

"I can't say I'm sorry I got the place," said Nat, gently, "but I wish you had one too, Jim."

"Oh, it's all very well for you to say that," said the boy. "Get out of my way," and he gave the too inquisitive Mop a kick with his foot, and was off the next instant down a side street. Mop pursued him, barking furiously, but Nat called him back, and they went home quite soberly together.

The next morning Nat commenced his work, and very soon had became a great favorite with the clerks, as well as with the head of the firm. He was always conscientious, prompt and obliging, and full of a certain bright humor that brought freshness and life into the quiet office. Mop instead of being a trouble, was a great amusement, and the young man taught him a number of tricks, of which he was very proud. Sometimes they noticed a shade of anxiety and trouble on Nat's bright face, but they did not know that on the boy's way home at night he was often subject to petty persecutions that he had found it hard to bear. One morning he burst into the office with flashing eyes and the tears running down his face. The clerks looked up in consternation.

"What is the matter?" one of them asked anxiously.

"Jim Elder's killed my dog," cried Nat, passionately. "I could stand anything he did to me—but Mop——."

He stopped—it seemed as if he could not go on.

"What a shame—how did he do it?" asked his sympathising and indignant listeners.

"Threw a stone at him, and it hit him in the head," said Nat in a smothered tone. When I took him up he was quite dead."

"Where is the wretched boy?" they asked, with righteous indignation.

"He cut and run while I was going to Mop," said Nat, dejectedly. "Oh, there is no use talking any more about it."

The boy went around for the next few days, looking as if he had lost a near and dear friend, and they all felt profoundly sorry for him. On his way home in the evening Nat looked in vain for the destroyer of his dog, intending to take summary vengeance on him, but nowhere did he see him.

"I guess he knows enough to keep out of my way," he thought gloomily. "Oh, Mop, Mop, how I miss you!"

"Not long afterwards a messenger boy came into the office with a note directed to Master Nat Meadows, from one of the nurses in B——Hospital.

"There is a boy in my ward," the note ran, "very ill with a kind of low fever. He says he has done you an injury, and cannot rest until he sees you. Will you come to him?"

"It must be Jim Elder," thought Nat, "and I don't want to go."

All his life Nat had been taught by his honest, hard-working mother to listen to the voice of conscience, and do always what was right, yet it was hard to put down anger, and the sense of injury and injustice done to himself and to his companion Mop. But the next afternoon he walked slowly up to the hospital, and with a hesitating hand pulled the iron doorbell. In one of the upper wards he was met by the nurse who had written to him, and was taken to the end of the room where Jim Elder lay tossing to and fro.

As soon as the sick boy saw Nat he sat up in bed, strong with fever, and held out his hand, "Nat," he said, "I want to hear you say that you forgive me. I've been awful jealous, and mean as could be to you, and then I killed Mop; I am sorry. Every night it seemed as if you came and stood beside my bed, and I can't get any sleep."

The boy sank back on the pillow exhausted, with his bright eyes fixed on Nat, who was not looking at Jim, but at a spot in the carpet; and a tumult was struggling within him. The one who had done him more injury than any one else in his life lay before him. He was afraid he could not say from his heart that he fully forgave him for wantonly killing his little favorite. No, the words choked him. At length he raised his eyes. The victory was half won, but only half. "I am sorry you're sick, Jim," he said drawing a long breath.

"Say you forgive me," whispered the sick boy, but still Nat was silent.

Over the bed hung a colored text, at which Nat looked vaguely for a minute without taking in its meaning. "Forgive and ye shall be forgiven," he repeated to himself. Suddenly his face flushed and he grasped his cap with a convulsive movement. The words which seemed written all over the wall in letters of light entered his heart. Could he ever pray, "Forgive us our trespasses," unless he freely forgive his prostrate enemy? Ah no, never. How bitter and hard he had been, and a great wave of contrition swept over him. The battle was won at last, but not in his unaided strength.

"Jim," he said, "I do forgive you, for Mop, for everything," and, breaking down with a sob, he left the room. Every visitors' day after that saw a bright-eyed boy sitting beside the now convalescent Jim, talking, reading to him and filling that little corner with sunshine. When the sick boy was able to leave the hospital he found a place open to him. He did not know that Nat had gone to one of the clerks in his office, and that it was through his intercession with the head of the firm that the place had been secured. But he guessed that Nat was the mainspring of his good fortune, and it touched him to the quick.

Nat forgave much, and found great joy in doing it; peace of conscience, a chance to help another back to health and useful labor, and bound to his side by ties of gratitude and love a life-long friend.—Jean Sutherland Reese.

BERLIN, June 6.—Violent thunderstorms, accompanied by the bursting of waterspouts, have, for several days past, prevailed in Central Germany, and in the Harts Mountain territory in the northwestern part of the Empire houses and railways have been destroyed. Hailstones weighing two ounces have fallen at Giessen. It is estimated that the damage by the storms to crops alone will exceed $250,000. A number of people have been killed by lightning.

LONDON, June 7.—The island of Chios, Turkey, has experienced an earthquake. No damage was done.

There was a street riot between Catholics and Orangemen in Belfast, Ireland, yesterday, in which several persons were injured, but none killed.

Nine persons perished in a fire on South Canal street, Chicago, early this morning—one entire family, named Murphy, including man, wife and four children, two members of another family named Durkin, mother and son, and an old man named William Hahn, who was suffocated in adjoining house. The fire started in the basement and was evidently the work of an incendiary.

WITHOUT THE CAMP.

Let us go forth unto him. Heb. xiii. 13.

"Let us go forth!" and leave the world behind us,
And meet the perils of the pilgrim way!
Where Jesus walked let mocking scoffers find us,
Still hastening onward, as they bid us stay.

"Let us go forth!" and tell the same sweet story,
How Christ a helpless babe became;
Point to the dying Lamb, the Lord of glory,
Strong in the might that lives in Jesus' name.

"Let us go forth!" The pilgrim and the stranger
Owns not the earth his weary foot must tread;
God's sinless Son, once pillowed in a manger,
Had not below wherein to rest his head.

"Let us go forth!" Where Jesus walked before us,
Honored by praise or reviler's fiendish breath;
God's eye of love is fondly watching o'er us,
The arms eternal stretching underneath.

"Let us go forth!" Without the camp there liveth
The strength of Israel. To of heavenly birth,
Each in the smile the loving Master giveth
To them that follow him. "Let us go forth!"

NOTES ON ANASTASIS.—NO. 18.

I have in previous articles on this theme shown the utter absurdity of the thought of a "sprout body," and that what is called the "sown body," and the "sprout body," are just as much divinely given as the "raised body," for which alone is claimed Divine Authorship. I have shown by the sure word of the Most High that it is all of God. That the entire working out of the fixed and immutable laws of nature is all of God. That he is God and "there is none else." In the entire range of Scripture, nor yet in any work on natural science, is the thought of being born applied to the vegetable world in any way. Neither is the thought of building the human frame or any animal frame. One or two more extracts from Anastasis that the further absurdity of the theory of "mortal emergence" may appear in its own true light, in contrast with the light of Revelation.

"But the analogy of nature in resurrection is not confined to the sprouting, or germinating, and ripening into the fruit of righteousness which is incorruptibility and life. Rom. viii. 10. It is seen in a field of newly sown grain. When the seed scattered therein has lain certain days in the earth, (here is a free admission that the seed sown lies in the earth) if germinable it sprouts, or springs into view, and the whole field looks fresh and green. But what observer from mere appearance of the field of vision, can tell whether the green herb be grass, wheat, rye or chess? (Any agriculturalist is able to tell very readily.) If he desire a pure field of wheat and he were to undertake to separate the wheat from the chess and rye, he would be as likely to root up the wheat as the others, being so much alike before having received the bodies the Deity has been pleased to give them."

A moment's reflection will convince every common sense thinking individual that this entire assertion carries with it no weight, because it falsifies nature and belittles man's understanding as to what he knows and what he does not know. I state on authority that any agriculturist of ordinary ability and discernment can tell wheat from rye as it comes up out of the ground. And further, he well knows that if he pulls up the rye, which is of necessity in close proximity to the wheat, he ("will root up the wheat also") will loosen the soil in which the wheat has taken root, and thereby render it liable to be withered by the wind or sun or both coming in contact with the roots. He continues, "So also is the resurrection field of bodies, sprouted, germinated or generated from the dust. Viewed by a spectator unacquainted with their antecedents, all who have come forth, both just and unjust appear alike to him. He could not, from mere appearance, seperate the one from the other. The crowd before him in this stage of resurrection, which is simply 'Anastasis,' or standing up, are in corruption, dishonor, weakness and naturality; for these physical qualities are constituents of all bodies begotten, conceived in dust —'dust of the earth, earthy;' yet very good bodies in the sense that the first Adam's was very good before he sinned. Gen. i. 31: ii. 7."

In this quotation is presented a view of resurrection, to support which there is not found one text from Genesis to the end of Revelation. Where, in the entire range of Holy Writ is there even the most distant hint that God's chosen ones will be awakened out of the sleep death, in a state of "corruption, dishonor, to endure weakness and naturality"? How could such an unwarranted, unscriptural assertion ever have been repeated in print? Why was not it as well as the entire theory of "mortal emergence" at once and forever blotted out, when the light of divine truth shone upon it? Truly the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. It is absolutely false to assert that an animal body of any kind or character can be "sprouted, generated, germinated, conceived or begotten" in the dust! The allwise Creator in his wisdom has fixed and established certain laws by which he rules and governs nature, the work of his own hand. Included in these immovable and fixed laws is the law of generation, as pertaining to all animal life. The experience of all human observation has proved beyond dispute that no living animal substance is conceived or begotten in the dust. To beget is to infuse a living substance into a living substance. A dead body cannot conceive neither can a dead body beget! Both must be alive. This law is changeless as the fiat of Jehovah; and he or she who dares to ignore or evade it by human reasoning lifts up their voice against the Most High. Neither the prophets, the Master himself, nor any of his inspired followers have said one word about bodies being conceived or begotten in the dust of sheol. Then I say with all earnestness of soul, away with all such vagaries. They are false and misleading.

Again I quote from Anastasis, "But to return to the similitude of the fields fresh and green. On the supposition that the seeds sown were all wheat, and that it had all made a very fair show to the eye, nevertheless agriculturists know well that much of what has sprung forth will, from various causes, perish; to use the phraseology of Paul, that to very many of the plants the Deity will not give bodies bearing seed. So also will it be in the resurrection of the saints. Many sinners become saints by the obedience of faith, and run well for a time. The obedience of faith constitutes them wheat. After a time, however, they are often bewitched, and tire of obeying the truth. Gal. iii. 1. Hence their vitality or vigor is impaired, and they become wheat of a shrivelled and feeble constitution. Their character becomes sickled over with the pale cast of scepticism, indifference, apathy, and conformity to the world and its practices. Thus they walk after the flesh, which is regarded by Deity as sowing to the flesh, the penalty of which is death."

In this entire quotation there is not a point even assumed to be made in favor of the theory advanced. It is given only to show how lame, how feeble and groundless, such a view appears when placed side by side with the words of the living God. Yet the author continues, "Now according to the constitution of the wheat sown, is the ability when sprouted to resist the influences which cause to perish. So with saints of the Sardian type, who have a name that they live and are dead. The pallor of death is upon their characters, so that when bodies come forth from sheol, those upon whom are enstamped or flashed these sickly, death-stricken characters, are occasions of being identical with the bewitched of a former state. Boldness in the day of judgment does not pertain to such. The influences which cause to perish will be too strong for them, for the account they give of themselves will be truthful then, if they eschewed the truth before, and this will overwhelm them in shame and condemnation. They will be wheat turned to chest to which is never given the wheat body bearing seed. The divine sentence will be against them, so that an incorruptible and living house from heaven will be withheld, and they will perish in the corruption of the sprout body in returning to the dust from whence it came."

These are the closing arguments and illustrations in favor of mortal emergence presented in Anastasis. In contrast with these and what has gone before, I present one brief view of resurrection as taught in the sure word of the Lord; 1 Thes. iv. 13-18. "For we would not have you ignorant brethren, concerning them that fall asleep; that ye sorrow not even as the rest which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that are fallen asleep will God through Jesus, bring with him. For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we that are alive, that are left unto the coming of the Lord, shall in no wise precede them that are fallen asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the arch angel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we that are alive, that are left, shall together with them be caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore exhort one another with these words."

And now my brethren, my sisters, I ask you, yea, I earnestly beseech you to look this matter all over. Be not high minded, but fear lest you have been led astray. Make choice between these two views of resurrection. Assuredly they are not both taught by the great Jehovah; for he is not "the author of confusion." It is all vanity to say "let it alone, it is a vexed question," "a mere point of doctrine not worth contending about." Remember we are commanded to contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints. The doctrine of the resurrection of the saints as given just above was once delivered to the saints, nor was it in any way marred by the untempered mortar of "mortal emergence." We cannot do justice to our own souls and not speak out against such heresies. I ask you to make choice, if the Lord be God believe Him, if not believe those who set up their creeds in opposition to his everlasting truth. In the one case "God hath spoken," and surely he who hath spoken has also made it plain by the mouth of his inspired servants of old in the other case mortal man has spoken and has set forth such an incongruous mass of speculative thoughts that they not only disagree with the inspired word, but they fail to harmonize with themselves.

The remainder of Anastasis is given to other subjects than mortal resurrection. As this was the only theme I purposed writing on in these "Notes," I close where the subject is dropped. But before "taking my leave" I beg to suggest a thought or two for the consideration of those who take Anastasis as the man of their counsel. Is it reasonable to suppose that a man whom time has unquestionably proved to be so grossly mistaken in his applications of prophetic dates, should be judged perfectly reliable in his expositions of other portions of Scripture? Let me urge you to lay aside all the manfearing spirit that binds the mother of Harlots and her daughters to their respective creeds. Reflect on what has been written; take it with you to the word of God, and if the doctrine of resurrection as set forth in these "Notes" be not there taught, believe me not. Take also to the same reliable standard, the doctrine of mortal resurrection as set forth in Anastasis, and also the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, including an endless hell of torment, and an intervening purgatory; and you will find no more evidence in the word for mortal emergence, than you will for "St. Peter" standing at the gate of heaven to usher in each ransomed soul made pure by the fires of purgatory! There is no time to be lost in idle contention about words, without knowledge. It is indeed no small matter to attempt to pervert the words of the Most High. "He hath spoken" and who will dare to gainsay what he has revealed? It is a fearful thing to be found fighting against God. Those who fight against his purposes as set forth in the written word are assuredly fighting against him. In reply to the query, "Why have you written these notes?" I say, Because the Lord put it into my heart and then gave me strength of mind and body (Prov. iii. 5, 6) to show forth in plain language what the teachings of his word are, on this theme, in opposition to an absurd theory presented by an uninspired man, and accepted without question by his blinded followers. I have not now nor have I ever had an unkindly feeling either to the founder or to any member of the Christadelphian body.

I have never read any of Dr. Thomas's works since 1858 and 59 when I took his Herald of the Kingdom till within two years I read a few pages of the first volume of Eureka. Last November I read Anastasis. I read with profound astonishment what his views were. I turned back, read and reread, comparing them with the written word, as this alone is my standard of faith. Learning that Anastasis was a standard work amongst the Christadelphians, I in some measure realized that the terrible heresy therein taught was believed by hundreds and thousands of poor, innocent souls who had never thought for themselves. I lifted my pen and I have in part exposed the heresy. In doing this I have but sought to obey the command given by our dear Master, viz., all things whatsoever ye would that men would do unto you do ye even so to them. Yes, if at any time I forget, or fail to compare what I write with revealed truth, and thus endeavor to set up a theory of my own, I want to see it rent to pieces, as I have with the sword of the spirit, root mortal emergence. Yes, it is rent! And there is found none who can heal it. There is no use in trying to smooth it over and say "it will make no difference." I say we have no right to misrepresent the Great Creator in his wondrous works. I say let us purge out all such uninspired dogmas. Let us have, and let us lift up to the world, a faith that works by love, purifies the heart and overcomes the world. Not a faith that breeds strife and contention as we now see manifested in the Christadelphian body. They cannot defend their faith because it rests not on the sure word of the living God! Concluded. May the God of all grace bless this feeble effort to advance his blessed truth. Your sister,

CARRIE WILLIAMS.

MICA-PEN NOTES.

I remember that life is short, that opportunities go by on the run. I have reason now, I can work today. Tomorrow it may not be so. So I say, though I have an article now in the hands of the kind Editor, I will write again nevertheless. And this thought again, recurs, in an admonitory way, that an article so long as the one of March 24, over my name, ought to be rarely sent. O, the tediousness of length sometimes! And there is where a "mica-pen" needs wisdom. Pardon me, O patient souls, that, just that once, I was so toying with thoughts and words long drawn out. I can appreciate your inward groans, and beware.

Somehow in these days, there is a quickened sense of the nearness of the kingdom, and on my face, if I am tired and afflicted, it is not so wonderful if I cry in even an agony of prayer, "Lord, come quickly." What an omen in all events, current and coming, of the Lord's perusal! One needs the glory of the re-creation by God's power. But then again it is good to lift up one's head in glorious hope and expectation!

And there is one grand kind and quality of knowledge, the knowledge that God is good. This is the essence and glory of all right instruction and useful information. It is so rare to see this great wonder well and truly set forth. And when there is a heart and hand and brain, that can and does give this one saving and towering truth, a true and full presentation and representation, I say give the minister of the truth room. Give him a place, give him love and sympathy and welcome. O, the misery and darkness of not knowing that "God is good, and doeth good,"—of not seeing it—of seeing it fatally and acratically and obliquely! O, the peace and power of God's newly seen glory of goodness,—that trials and pains and sore afflictions are meant for good, for good to saints first—and finally, to all. And there I will stop.

I said omens tell us the Lord is near—Yes, the omens speak. How they multiply, and how they are multiplying!

What think you, O, fellow saints—is to be the reason and cause of the great cry, "behold the Bridegroom cometh!" What is to be the substance and power and authenticity of it? Who shall arise and speak those words with such power as to command credence? Who? Or if it is an event, what shall it be? What quality of suddenness, of energy and power shall inhere in an event, that none can disown, deny or decry, of any and all who have an idea of Jesus coming in person? It must have power to rouse conviction. It must be striking, it may be phenomenal and astounding. I have an idea of it, but I speak it not, because some might be incredulous, or conceive the suggestion "speculative" or fanatical. Let us be ready. Strange developments are impending. We do not glide upward into rest and victory, in a somnolent state. Let us at least have the spirit of self-surrender to Christ, and even unto death if need be, and if he sees us so affected, he may keep us out of the trial that shall come on the whole world—but the spirit must be in us—at least I think so. And let us be ready each instant. I said to a friend the other day, "I have nothing now to bind me to the earth, nothing. I am ready for the kingdom, so far as any earthy or earthly restraint is concerned." We are sometimes told, the righteous dead are already raised. But while I do not contradict such a declaration, I take it with reservation, and as not at present demonstrated or demonstratable. There are grand advances all along the line of inquiry in things sowed and revealed, but one may nevertheless go too fast or too far. One thing has in it a grain of comfort. You say, what is it? I answer, God's pity for his waiting and afflicted ones. There are so many disappointments! Some can say, and say truly—"I have had no worldly property for years. I have had losses and crosses, and this, when I was all the time seeking to God for direction."

Well, aching heart, this may be because God will have you ready at the very instant of the Deliverer's coming for rescue. When you are tired, and sorrowful, and burdened, and weak and weary, and looking and longing for the help and strength of heaven in the person of God's own Son, then Jesus knows whom to call for, and to lift up, to rouse and raise up, into the sweet light of his presence. Don't you think so? And really when you see the sea raging, and hear it roaring, in the agitations of this very time, you can be on the alert, you can look for your Lord. He is a wonderful and mighty one! He is a King and Redeemer. He has all preeminence and perfection. (Jesus, look on the groaning earth, and look on thy buffeted and battered people!)

Did I speak of the sea roaring? Well, let it roar, if it will, and if it must. Just think of the rushing of the waters, the tumult of the people. Modern life is such a torrent. And fitly will the hurrying world bear a shock. O no; it will not have a bit in its mouth. It is mad on its idols. It will be angry when there is a call to halt, a call too earnest and powerful to be turned aside.

How comparatively few there are who really would love to sit down and talk with shining eyes or beating heart of the signs of the imminent second coming! Talk of them in the aggregate, and in detail! And some who will bear a faint allusion to the subject, nevertheless, are evidently glad to glide instantly into some trivial commonplaces. To see new tokens of the kingdom near, how refreshing! To unlearn any error if need be, and to always give the truth a greeting, this is good. I would not be crystalise into an opinion, as not be susceptible of enlargement or modification.

Note. I saw the name of an alleged manufacturer of dynamite bombs, the other day. I think I saw him in Alabama, some years ago, and heard him pour forth his thoughts, in a torrent of menace and blasphemy.

Query. Is there not imminent danger that a great organization, originally well intentioned, may be ruled by an influence that is atheistic, at an early day? Is it certain to be conscious of its tendency and destiny?

Note. A little pamphlet was sent me by a friend, lately, written by a Catholic, and who seems to have predicted two years in advance, extraordinary troubles in the earlier half of this year. And he still farther predicts Satan coming incarnate, very soon indeed! The writer evidently has some light, and needs some kind instruction perhaps, but even a Catholic may be taught of God, in some degree, surely, for great reformers were once Catholics. Personally, I doubt not there are true Christians even among Romanists.

Now, as an example of reasonable brevity, perhaps I should close. Let me say I liked the matter and spirit of the two columns by Samuel Wilson, in this week's RESTITUTION. Grace and peace to all who love the word, and the Lord, and are waiting in tribulation and hope.

The Book of Jobab, called Job, Son of Zare, Son of Bruzzel, Son of Hesau, Son of Isaac, Son of Habraam. — According to the Septuagint.

CHAPTER XVI.

1. And Job taking up the discourse saith,
2. Many such things have I heard. Bad comforters are ye all.
3. What indeed! Have spiritual words no set order? Will anything stir them up to make answer?
4. I at least will talk plainly to you, if your soul (mind here) will put itself in my place; then will I leap upon you with words and shake my head in derision of you!
5. May there be strength in my mouth, and I will not spare lip-movement.
6. For if I talk freely I shall not feel the pain of my wound; and if I remain silent shall I be wounded any the less?
7. Even now that which hath cut me down hath produced worthless satisfaction, and it hath laid hold of me; for earthly restraint is conserved.
8. For testimony hath in some be past; my falsity hath risen up against me; to my face hath it answered me.
9. Using me with wrath it hath cast me down; it hath gnashed its teeth against me; the arrows of its inquisitors have fallen upon me.
10. With the barbed glances of its eyes hath it impaled me; swiftly hath it smitten me, brought me to my knees; and with one accord have they run down upon me.
11. For the Lord hath given me up to the hands of wrong-doers and hath cast me over to the irreverent.
12. He hath put me to confusion who was at peace; He hath taken me by the hair of the head and plucked it away; he hath withstood me like a spy as it were.
13. Those who hurl spears into my vitals have encompassed me, sparing not they have poured out my gall on the earth;
14. They have cast me down with smiting upon smiting; mighty ones have run against me.
15. They have sewed sackcloth upon my skin and my groaning hath been stifled with earth;
16. My stomach hath been consumed with lamentation, and there is a shadow upon my eye-lids:
17. And that too when there was nothing wrong in my hands and my votive prayer was clean.
18. O earth, cover not the blood of my flesh; may there be no place for my cry.
19. And now lo, my witness is in heaven and my fellow-conscience is in the midst of the most high.
20. May my supplication come unto the Lord, and in his sight may mine eye distil.
21. And may man's reproof be in the sight of the Lord, even his reproof of the Son of man, his neighbor.
22. Unnumbered years may come; but the way I go I shall not have returned. (Notice the exact truth of this statement.)

Editor Restitution:

Dear Sir, enclosed you will find one dollar for THE RESTITUTION and also twenty cents for an assorted package of the Bible pearls. I moved in this section of the country 3 months ago. I moved here from Greenup, Ill., where we had a small church of ten in number, we were all baptized by our most worthy brother S. T. Hook, of New Palestine, Ind. I was almost driven to infidelity by the unreasonable doctrines and heathen dogmas, of the so-called orthodox of the present day. But when brother Hook presented the truth to me, and I investigated the divine oracles I found they were not to be held responsible for the teachings of a set of men that claim to be teachers of the word of God. I have been preaching for the people here of Saturday night and Sundays, and have a large congregation, and good attention, and have a great many believers of the word of God, but no doers. I will endeavor to send you some subscribers for THE RESTITUTION from here, as I regard it a most worthy paper and of being the means of bringing about the truth as it is in Christ Jesus. Your brother in hope.

LABOR'S MISTAKE.

Mr. Powderly and his associates in the labor convention at Cleveland are somewhat late in their recognition of the fact that the strikes and boycotts of the past few months have brought about "a serious condition of things," and that these agencies have been used to the detriment of labor as well as capital. It is daily becoming more apparent that the workingmen of this country made a fatal blunder when they gave countenance to the recent revolt against existing industrial conditions. In fact, the labor agitators could hardly have selected a more inopportune time for inaugurating such a revolt than the present season. The year opened with promise of increased activity in many lines of business, and the general outlook for trade and manufacture was more hopeful than it had been for several years. Especially was this true in the building trades, where the contracts and preparations for work were on an unusually extensive scale. Under favoring conditions the year undoubtedly would have marked at least the beginning of better times. Business would have assumed a firmer and more confident tone, and various industries which were just recovering from the depressing influences of the past seasons would have attained renewed strength and vigor. But on the very eve of this revival, and at the most critical period of the year for commercial interests in general, the revolutionists plunged the country into a conflict which not only resulted in the destruction of many lives and much property, but has effectually retarded the forward movement in trade, and in some directions has destroyed all hope of returning prosperity. Strikes, lockouts, boycotts and riots have acted like an untimely frost upon the renewed and renewing evidences of business life, and have cut off in the germ many projects and enterprises which promised large returns to labor as well as to capital. Contracts without number have been suspended or rescinded, and investments amounting to millions have been, where possible, withdrawn. The fact has been noted in these columns that in the one city of Chicago the amount to be expended in building trades this year is estimated at $10,000,000 less than it would have been had the labor troubles not occurred. And what is true of Chicago is doubtless true of other cities and sections of the country.

Few men care to undertake the erection of buildings, or to engage in other enterprises requiring large outlays when matters are likely to be brought to a standstill at any time, without warning by some "walking delegate" or visiting committee of hod-carriers. All trades and business enterprises have been affected to a greater or less degree in the same way. The situation everywhere is full of doubt and uncertainty; business risks have been doubled, and the chances in favor of profitable returns for capital have been largely thrown on the reverse side. A halt has been called all along the line. The general sentiment is expressed in the words: Let us wait and see. There are some who can afford to "wait and see;" there are many who cannot. Among the latter are the workingmen who have been deluded into the belief that the golden age, if not the millennium, was at the beck and call of Executive Committees and Protective Associations.

If the mere dictum of a labor organization could make prosperity or increase the profits of business so that employers could pay twice the wages for half the time, then there would be some reason for placing one's faith to the proclamation of a secret order, or trusting one's present and future worldly interests to the mercies of "walking delegates." But the reasoning is vain, and the faith is vain. The honest employers and reputable business men of the country will naturally continue to refuse to make money for the mere sake of complying with the demands of insolent outsiders, or keep the doors of their factories and storehouses open that labor unions may come in and possess them. If the business of the country was something that could be taken by the throat and made to prosper nolens volens, there would be some excuse for resorting to violent measures to gain higher wages and shorter hours.

But there is one thing that no man nor any number of men combined can do, and that is to force "good times" on the country. Prosperity might be won back again by gentle entreaty, but hardly by the use of fists and clubs. The times have been hard, and they will be harder, before the country recovers from the reverses occasioned by the recent disturbances. Nothing can be more certain than that workingmen will have to pay dearly in the end for the time and money lost in sustaining the extensive strikes of the past few months. This is unfortunate for the frugal and industrious class who held aloof from the strikers, and for those who were forced into the struggle against their better judgment, but the result named is natural and inevitable. Employers and business men who have some reserve capital can easily tide over a period of depression, while poor men must suffer all that follows lack of employment and loss of wages. The lesson will be a bitter one, but it will not be in vain if workingmen everywhere are taught thereby that intelligence, patience and moderation are stronger forces in every struggle for right and justice than intemperate zeal and headstrong folly.—*N. ODELL.—In Hastings Township, Mich., at the residence of Amasa Richardson, May 19, 1886, Mrs. Polly Odell, aged 91 years.

Mrs. Odell was born in North Carolina, March 22, 1795. At the age of four years she moved with her parents to Ohio, a distance of six hundred miles. Living in a new country during the war of 1812, she experienced the many dangers and privations consequent to frontier life. At the age of 22 she was married to Boswell Odell, with whom she lived many years, raising a family of seven children. At the age of 61 she was left a widow. Seven years later she moved to Michigan where she has since resided, living with her son, Wm. Odell, and family, and with her daughter, Mary A. Boice. In her younger days she was a member of the Disciple church, but many years she has been a believer in the sleep of the dead. She retained her reason until the last. Funeral services in the Disciple church at Goats' Grove, May 21, E. Hoyt of Grand Rapids officiating.

Fold the hands on the palseless bosom
That in life was rarely still,
And with fragrant bud and blossom,
Light up the gloom, death is so chill.

Let us now refrain from weeping,
'Till death she labored for it is right;
In fields now she's sweetly sleeping,—
Such are precious in his sight.

He will open death's dark portal,
That holds her like a captive bound;
Then all glorious and immortal,
With his estate she shall be found.

MARY A. BOICE.

"I AM WITH YOU ALWAY."

'Tis sweet to read the promise He hath given
To cheer our hearts along the pilgrim way,
But sweeter far to know its blest fulfilment,
And humbly walk with Jesus day by day.

To walk with Jesus! who shall tell the gladness
Of those whose daily life the Master shares?
Who hear his voice, so full of love and pity,
And rest on him their burdens and their cares?

And this is mine—the joy of knowing Jesus,
All walking in the sunlight of His smile;
Mine is the peace that flow'th like a river,
Deeper and broader growing all the while.

No more a transient guest my Savior cometh,
To please me but awhile and then depart;
But with me now He evermore abideth,
And with His own glad presence fills my heart.

Sometimes, when busy with my daily labor,
Yet thinking of the mighty love He bore,
Some precious promise unto me He giveth,
Oft-read, perhaps, but never mine before.

I know not why He gives His choicest blessings
To one so undeserving of His love;
But, since He calls, with willing feet I follow,
Content and glad to hear Him say, "Well done."

Content to walk in paths of His own choosing,
Since He will hold my hand along the way;
Content to know that I am journeying homeward,
And brighter grows the pilgrim's path each day.

Editor Restitution.

I was much struck by the letter of Sister Angelina Wilson, giving an affecting account of the deep gloom into which she had been cast—she at last discovered—by the lack of prayer. If we would all tell our stories as faithfully, there would be many singular revelations, and it is usually not until we discover how much the warmth has left our hearts, that we, profiting by experience, take care to keep near the "Sun of Righteousness" who only hath "healing in his wings." What a lesson is taught us in the kindly aid which the good sister brought her! What a lesson to us all to remember that where one member suffers, all suffer. "They that loved the Lord spake often one to another." "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

I send you an extract on the important privilege as well as duty of prayer, which, if you have room to spare, may give some stirring incentives to it. It runs thus: "We speak of this Christian and that Christian as a man of prayer—Jesus was emphatically so. The Spirit was poured upon him without measure yet he prayed. He was incarnate wisdom, needing not that any should teach him. He was infinite in his power and boundless in his resources—yet he prayed. How deeply sacred the prayerful memories that hover around the solitudes of Olivet and the shores of Tiberias. He seemed often to turn night into day to redeem moments for prayer rather than lose the privilege. We are rarely indeed admitted into the solemnities of his inner life. The veil of night is generally between us and the Great High Priest when he entered into the holiest of all, but we have enough to reveal the depth and fervor, the tenderness and confidingness of this blissful communion with his Heavenly Father. All his public acts were consecrated by prayer. His baptism, his transfiguration, his miracles, his agony, his death. He breathed away his spirit in prayer, 'Father, forgive them, they know not what they do.' How sweet to think in holding communion with God that Jesus drank of this very brook! He consecrated the bended knee and the silent chamber. He refreshed his fainting spirits at the same great fountain-head from which it is life for us to draw and death to forsake!"

My brethren and sisters, I often think if we would look carefully over the messages to the "seven churches which are in Asia," we might derive great instruction from them, and be much stimulated to put on "the whole armor of God." We shall see by the perilous condition in which most of them stood, that there is no room for slumbering. Smyrna and Philadelphia alone escaped threats. In Sardis a few individuals were found who had not defiled their garments. Let this arouse us to the fact that however much we may help each other, each one must stand an individual test.

In looking over those messages it will strike us that false doctrine is most hateful to God. In the message to the church of Ephesus, though they were accredited with their "works, labor, patience, hatred of evil, and hatred of the Nicolaitans," yet because they had "lost their first love" they were threatened that their "candlestick should be removed out of its place." What are all these things without love? Our Lord summed up all the commandments in this one word. It is what gives to all acts their worth. Of what value would hundreds of bodies be without life in them? No more than hundreds of acts without love. It is the fulfilling of the law. Let us then, brethren and sisters, give ourselves up to that truly spiritual life to which Brother Wilson in his account of his visit to Greenwood Cemetery exhorts us, ere we too go to the narrow house for the living to await the last day of account.

Then comes Smyrna, against which there was no charge. "Thy works, thy tribulation, thy poverty" were mentioned. Let such as labor under these so-called misfortunes take courage. They may be safe-guards, they may keep us close to God. Whom he loveth he chasteneth. To such is promised, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life."

Then comes the message to Pergamos. They were commended for "their works," "holding fast my name," "not denying the faith;" but, because there had among them those who held the doctrine "of Balaam" and the "Nicolaitans" ("which thing I hate") our Lord says, "Repent or I will come unto thee quickly and fight against thee." Oh, brethren, what a fearful thing it is to have God to fight against us. Who can meet such a foe? Then let us beware of tampering for a moment with false doctrine, whether it be to belittle our Lord, or to teach that all shall be saved by any number of "chances," when Christ himself tells us there is some sin which cannot be forgiven either in this world or that which is to come!"

Sardis had "works" and a name to live, but was dead. She was warned to "repent or I will come upon thee as a thief." But then comes the encouraging words, "Thou hast a few names, a few names even in Sardis, which have not defiled their garments, and they shall walk with me in white." If, among so much spiritual death and decay, a few had not defiled their garments, what encouragement to each one to look diligently at his own walk that he may be found worthy of this great honor!

But to Philadelphia he says, "I know thy works; behold I have set before thee an open door and no man can shut it; for thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word and hast not denied my name.....Because thou hast kept the word of my patience I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation which shall come upon all the earth," etc. Though they had but "little strength" these poor, feeble ones had kept "his word" and had not denied his name, therefore they are told by him, "I have loved thee."

Feeble ones, weak ones, who feel as our Sister Wilson expresses it, "I am illiterate," or I am deficient in any way, know of such our Lord has said; "I have loved them." Let us all, weak or strong, obey the injunction, "Hold fast that which thou hast," remembering that many who once seemed to run well, have fallen away and had their names blotted out of the Book of Life. Oh, what an awful thought, to have once had one's name written in the Book of Life among saints and martyrs, and then for the paltry things of this world, the wiles of the devil and the snares of the flesh, to have it blotted out! May God help us to arrest such an unspeakable woe. Your sister in the one hope,

SARAH MARBURGER.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

I continued meeting at Alden over Sunday. Preached Sister Mason's funeral sermon Sunday at 2 o'clock. Sunday night, April 18, being the passover, we met at Brother Pilcher's house to celebrate the anniversary of the death and sufferings of our crucified and risen Lord, and it proved a joyous feast. Thus ended our long to be remembered meeting with the brethren at Alden. I left Alden Tuesday, stopped at Gladbrook with Brother Berry over night and started for Lanark, Ill., next day, where I arrived Thursday morning. Went to Plum River in the afternoon and visited the friends till Sunday. Had two meetings Sunday. Monday went into the neighborhood of the Union Church and visited with the friends and brethren through the week. The nights being short and dark we did not have any meetings evenings. Had two meetings Sunday and baptized four willing souls in Christ for the remission of sins. The cause of truth is on the gain in this part of the country. Brethren pray for us that the good work may continue and a people be raised up that will be ready to meet the Lord when he comes, and share with him the glories of that blessed world.

Yours in hope,

T. J. WHITESITT.

The Pledge of Our Resurrection.

The resurrection of the dead is a great mystery. We cannot fully understand its possibility when viewed only in the light of nature. But when we come to a study of the subject from the standpoint of revelation it is vastly different. Many things are not clear to reason which are nevertheless true. Revelation states the fact clearly that man shall rise again. It matters little to us how this shall be accomplished, as long as we believe it. That it will be done is as certain and plausible as any other fact stated in the Scriptures. These are matters of faith, and as such may baffle our minds, but to the infinite Creator this is no more difficult than to create a universe and hold it together by his own omnific power. The Scriptures, however, declare Christ to be the pledge of our resurrection of all his children. He is "the first fruits of them that slept." "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his order: Christ the first-fruits; afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming." When we are in doubt concerning this subject we find the solution in him who is the resurrection and the life. He it is who solves every mystery, who settles every doubt, and who lightens every avenue of human faith and reason. In him and by him we have hope, for he it is who overcame death and the grave and ever liveth to make intercession for us. He is the pledge, assurance, cause of hope of our resurrection, for he is abundantly able to open the grave of every mortal and to speak to every sleeper in the words "Come forth," those that have done good unto the resurrection of life and those that have done evil to the resurrection of condemnation.

Palestine Exploration.

Mr. Laurence Oliphant has discovered the ruins of two synagogues on the north-east shores of the Lake of Galilee. One of these, at a place called Kenef, is in complete ruin: the walls of the other are standing to the height of 9 ft. An account of these ruins, with drawings, will appear in the new number of the Palestine Fund's Quarterly Statement. The site of the latter ruin, called Khurbet, Dar Aziz, is on the northern slope of the Wady Shukeiyet. Its dimensions are 60 ft. by 37 ft.; the height over the door is 4 ft. 6 in. It is oriented, and the entrance is in the eastern wall. The architecture is plain and simple; no cornices or carvings were found, but the interior is so thickly strewn with masses of building stone that some of the more ornamental features may have been concealed.

The old wall which has been lately found in Jerusalem, believed by Dr. Merrill to be the second wall, was exposed to the length of 120 ft. In the course of the excavations many relics of the Tenth Legion were found, including an inscription on a marble column found 15 ft. below the surface.

Capt. Condor is engaged upon a new book for the society on the condition of Palestine and its inhabitants in various ages, from the earliest times to the end of the crusading period; founded mainly on the monuments of cavilers. He intends to know, says the Athenæum, what we should have known of the Hebrews and their literature if both people and literature had entirely perished.

Prof. Hayter Lewis has undertaken a second visit to Jerusalem, with a view to the further examination of the Dome of the Rock and other points on which the last word has not yet been said.—Occident.

Figures on Liquor.

Saloons are more numerous in Chicago than most markets, says Dr. Birch of that city. There is a drinking place in Illinois for every 267 inhabitants, or every forty-eight families. In New York there are 2,449 more rum shops than food places, and in 1880 there were in the United States 180,073 saloon keepers, or as some one had aptly said, 181 regiments. In 1877 the amount of money spent throughout the Union for liquor was one-fourth of all the farm productions, or $2,457,523,658. This was $445,000,000 more than the value of the household furniture in use. The expenditure for drink in ten years was two thirds the value of real estate in this country.

The church of Christ at Cleveland, O., will hold meetings at 11 a. m. every Sunday (D. V.) in Standard Bachelor's Block, Rooms 26, 27, 28, on the West Corner of Bridge, North of Central Market Street, Euclid. Strangers from abroad will be welcomed and all earnest seekers after truth are welcome.

DIED.

Mason.—Died at Alden, Iowa, April 17, 1886, Sister Philinda Mason.

Sister Mason was born at Ashfield, Mass. Her maiden name was Alden. She has been a resident of Alden, Iowa, for eight years, living a consistent Christian life. She leaves a husband, one daughter and a large circle of friends to mourn her loss. But we sorrow not as those who have no hope, for if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, them which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. A sermon was preached on the occasion in the Methodist church by the writer from I Thess. v. 9, 10, to a large and attentive audience. T. J. WHITESITT.

THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM. No. 6.

There still remain a few more texts of Scripture which are supposed to support the doctrine that the kingdom of God or of heaven came into existence or was set up, in the days of Christ, or in the days of his Apostles immediately after his ascension to heaven.

In the gospels according to Matthew, Mark, and Luke, we have the record of one of the remarkable utterances of our Lord which has been used in the way mentioned. I shall quote these in full, in the order stated:—

"The Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Verily I say unto you, There be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom. And after six days Jesus taketh Peter, James, and John, his brother, and bringeth them up into an high mountain apart. And was transfigured before them: and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light. And, behold, there appeared unto them Moses and Elias talking with him." Matt. xvi. 27, 28; xvii. 1, 3.

"Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and sinful generation; of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father with the holy angels. And he said unto them, Verily I say unto you, That there be some of them that stand here, which shall not taste of death, till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power. And after six days Jesus taketh with him Peter, and James, and John, and leadeth them up into an high mountain apart by themselves: and he was transfigured before them. And his raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow; so as no fuller on earth can white them. And there appeared unto them Elias with Moses, and they were talking with Jesus." Mark viii. 38; ix. 1, 4.

"For whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he shall come in his own glory, and in his Father's, and of the holy angels. But I tell you of a truth, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the kingdom of God. And it came to pass about an eight days after these sayings, he took Peter and John and James, and went up into a mountain to pray. And as he prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment was white and glistering. And, behold, there talked with him two men, which were Moses and Elias: who appeared in glory, and spake of his decease which he should accomplish at Jerusalem." Luke ix. 27, 32.

There is here a promise given by our Lord to certain of his Apostles that they "should not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom." Such are the terms according to Matthew. Mark's account has a slight variation, as follows:—"Till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power;" and Luke's, "Till they see the kingdom of God." With this verbal variety there is substantial agreement to the effect as summarily stated by John in his gospel (i. 14) "We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth."

Commentators are not agreed as to the meaning of this passage. Cobbin says, (rather vaguely), "Entering upon his reign and giving earnest of his judgment in the fate of Jerusalem." Brown (on Matt. xvi. 27, 28) says, "For I who am now attended with all mean circumstances and sinless infirmities of human nature, will, in the last day, gloriously appear and judge men to eternal life or death, according as their works shall manifest them righteous or wicked; as the earnest of which some of you present shall, before they die, see me appear gloriously transfigured, and powerfully erecting my gospel church, in the abolition of ceremonial ordinances, and awfully destroying the city, temple and nation of the Jews, for their obstinacy and unbelief."

Barnes says on the passage in Matthew, "'Verily, I say unto you,' etc. To encourage them he assured them that though his kingdom was now obscure and despised, though he was cast out and little known, yet the time was near when he should be regarded in a different manner, and his kingdom be established with great power. This cannot refer to the end of the world, and there is no need of referring it to the destruction of Jerusalem. "Taste of death." That is, die; before they die they shall see this. "Son of man coming in his kingdom." Mark and Luke have explained this, Mark ix. 1. "Till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power." Luke ix. 27. "Till they see the kingdom of God." The meaning evidently is, till they should see my kingdom; i. e. my church now small, feeble, and despised, greatly enlarged, established, and spreading with great rapidity and extent. All this was accomplished. All these apostles except Judas lived to see the wonders of the day of Pentecost. Some of them, John particularly, saw the Jewish nation scattered, the temple destroyed, the gospel established in Asia, Rome, Greece and in a large part of the known world."

It will be observed that Barnes entirely ignores the record of Matthew, who reports that our Lord says, "till they see THE SON OF MAN coming in his kingdom." Now the fact is that neither Mark nor Luke was present, but Matthew was; and his report, being the fullest, is most likely to give the very words which were spoken. Apart from this, however, we shall see anon as to his interpretation of Mark and Luke.

I. C. Ryle D. D., Bishop of Liverpool, England, indicates an interpretation in the opposite direction, and much more reasonable he says "Not taste death till they see!" These words are interpreted in two ways. Some think that they mean, they shall not die till they see the church established and settled on earth. This is a very unsatisfactory explanation. The right view appears to be that which connects the verse with the transfiguration, and regards the glorious vision of the kingdom which the transfiguration supplied, as the fulfilment of the promise of the verse. This is the view of Jerome, Hillary, Chrysostom, Theophilact and many more.

"To apply the expression at some do to people not dying until they are converted is a very unjustifiable accommodation of the word, and a most improper use of Scripture."

It will be seen from these various commentaries that the idea of the church being the kingdom, though objected to by Bishop Ryle, is the popular interpretation of this utterance of our Lord.

A solution, however, which should retain the natural and Scriptural sense of the word is certainly to be preferred.

Observe, then, that verse 27 of Matt. xvi. is admitted on all hands to refer to a future personal coming of the Lord to judgement: "The Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then shall he reward every man according to his works." The parallel passages in Mark and Luke have a similar intimation prefixed to the promise under consideration; Luke putting it thus:—"in his own glory, and in his Father's, and of the holy angels." It is evident from the close connection of the two statements that the "coming of the Son of man in his kingdom" can refer to nothing more than "the coming of the Son of man in his glory," etc.

It has been supposed by some that our Lord promised that certain bystanders should live till this glorious event should actually take place. But this is a mistake; for although he had made such a promise, it could have been fulfilled by "TRANSLATION" that they should not see death," as in the case of Enoch. But Jesus simply promised that they should "SEE the Son of man coming in his kingdom." All three reports of the passage concur in this.

According to Scripture usage there are two ways of "SEEING" an event, namely, by witnessing the actual fact take place, and by seeing it, by anticipation, in vision. We have several instances of the latter, even in relation to the coming of the Son of man in his kingdom. Thus Daniel had a sight of this glorious event—"I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Dan. vii. 13, 14.

The whole of this vision is explained to the prophet as having its fulfilment in the future:—"These great beasts, which are four, are four kings, which shall arise out of the earth. But the saints of the most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever." Verses 17, 18.

But the future cannot be seen in the present as an actual fact; yet by the power of God it can be presented to the vision of his servants with as much vividness as if it really existed.

Now it so happens that one of the bystanders addressed by our Lord, namely his Apostle Peter, informs us that he was "an eyewitness of the majesty of Jesus." His words are:—"We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eyewitnesses of his majesty. For he received from God the Father honor and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount." 2 Pet. i. 16, 18.

It does not need to be stated that "the holy mount" mentioned here can be none other than the mount of transfiguration. On this mount, then, there was "SEEN" by Peter and others (for he says "WE") what he calls "his majesty," and which he declares was a good ground for his "having made known to them the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Now it is very remarkable that in each of the three Evangelists the account of the transfiguration immediately follows the promise of our Lord that some bystanders would have a sight of him coming in his kingdom; and, moreover, that this took place only a week after. It had not, therefore, occurred prior to the promise; and it occurred so shortly after it as to be placed by all the narrators at the distance of one week from the promise.

I have referred to the vision of Daniel, and it is farther worthy of inquiry if there is anything corresponding to this in the account of the transfiguration. Well, it is distinctly called a vision—"As they came down from the mountain, Jesus charged them, saying, Tell the vision to no man, until the Son of man be risen again from the dead." Matt. xvii. 2.

Mark has it "what things they had SEEN." This was, according to Luke "his glory," and according to Peter, "his majesty" as demonstrative of his power and coming. John, as already noticed, sums it up in the words "we beheld his glory." Matthew's description of the glory of Jesus, as thus manifested, is, "His face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as light." Jesus, therefore, was seen as he shall be when he really appears in "his glorious body" to establish his kingdom.

But this is not all. Luke informs us that "there talked with him two men who were Moses and Elijah, who appeared in glory and spake of his decease which he should accomplish at Jerusalem." Moses had been long since dead and buried. Elijah had long since "gone up by a whirlwind into heaven." The question as to whether Moses and Elijah were actually present in person, or whether they were only present in vision, does not materially affect the purpose for which the representation was given. That purpose seems to have been to show that the faithful shall in the kingdom, share the glory of Christ. Speaking of himself and the faithful, Paul says:—"As we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God." 1 Cor. xv. 49, 50.

"Our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ: Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself." Phil. iii. 20, 21. And John—"It doth not appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." John iii. 2.

It has been suggested, and with some show of reason, that the three disciples themselves represented another element of the kingdom, namely, the nation of Israel, and possibly the nations of the world, in the fleshly nature, who shall form the subjects of the Christ and his saints. With this additional element in the representation, we have a view of the kingdom in miniature, in several of its main elements, embracing rulers and ruled.

The idea that the church is the kingdom, has therefore no foundation upon any reasonable view of the transfiguration, and the promise which preceded it. The glorified saints have no place in the church here and now; for with the exception of Enoch and Elijah, and possibly Moses (who may have been raised again) the faithful are sleeping in the dust, or living in the flesh. And even those privileged persons just named, are as yet unperfected, being among those of whom the apostle says:—"And these all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise: God having provided (or lit. foreseen) some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect." Heb. xi. 39, 40.

Then the apostles, though they exercised a certain degree of authority in the churches, were, like all their fellow disciples, simply "HEIRS of the kingdom." Paul reproved the Corinthian disciples for their party zeal, and their partiality for certain men; and ironically taunted them with imagining they had already passed through the tribulation, and become possessors of the kingdom. He says:—"These things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos for your sakes; that ye might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written that no one of you be puffed up for one against another. For who maketh thee to differ from another? and what hast thou that thou didst not receive? now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it? Now ye are full, now ye are rich, ye have reigned as kings without us: and I would to God ye did reign, that we might with you. For I think that God hath set forth us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death: for we are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men." 1 Cor. iv. 6, 9. The Apostle here not only ridicules the idea of their then reigning, but he recognises their reigning in the future as a certainty, (if worthy), and farther expresses his strong desire for its realization, so that he might reign also.

It is confirmatory of the view we have taken of the transfiguration, that the Apostle Peter tells us that we have by it the prophetic word more confirmed, or made more sure. In connection with this it is worthy of notice that in all three accounts of the transfiguration, it is preceded by the confession of the Apostles of the Messiahship of Jesus, and his first intimation to them that he should be crucified. Christ crucified was to the Jews a stumbling-block; and it was both necessary and desirable that the Apostles of our Lord should be provided with some sustaining influence in the adverse times which were awaiting them. And was not the promise of a SIGHT of his glory, with so ample a fulfilment of it shortly afterwards, well fitted to afford such support. They might not hope to be privileged to escape death, as were Enoch and Elijah; but even should they suffer to the death, they had the case of Moses to give them the hope of partakers of the glory that shall be revealed; even as Jesus taught them in close connection with the promise we are considering:—"If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me. For whosoever will save his life shall lose it; and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it." Matt. xvi. 24, 25.

To be assured of the coming glory must be a strong motive to steadfastness, and this seems to have been the lesson intended to be taught to the Apostles by the Transfiguration.

WHAT THINK YE OF THE CHRIST? WHOSE SON IS HE?—Matt. xxii. 42.

Everything pertaining to the Christian religion, to practical piety and godliness, and to the blessedness of a future existence, hinges directly upon the answer to this inquiry of the Lord. Every hope of the professed Christian, either of this life or of that to come, his entire faith, and his every act of obedience to the gospel of the present age, is firmly based upon and incorporated in his reply to this one question, "What think ye of the Christ? whose Son is he?"

How is he related to humanity? How, when and under what circumstances did he become related to the Father Almighty, as the Son of God? What are his present relations to us, and what do we know of his future?

Frequent among the names applied to him in the New Testament Scriptures we know that the Christ is called "the Son of Man," and, also, that he is styled "the Son of God." The former appellation indicates a relationship to the human race, and the latter a relationship to the Creator of the universe. Of the former, the following are illustrations of its occurrence:

"The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head." Matt. viii. 20. "But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, (then saith he to the sick of the palsy,) Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thine house." Ibid. xix. 6. "The Son of man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a man gluttonous," etc. Ibid. xi. 18. "For the Son of man is Lord even of the Sabbath day." Ibid. xii. 8. "He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man." Ibid. xiii. 37. "The Son of man shall send forth his angels," etc. Ibid. 41. "Whom do men say that I the Son of man am?" Ibid. xvi. 13. "Tell the vision to no man, until the Son of man is risen again from the dead." Ibid. xvii. 9. "The Son of man shall be betrayed into the hands of men." Ibid. 22. "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Ibid. xxiv. 27. "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall the tribes of the earth mourn," etc. Ibid. 30. "Therefore be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh." Ibid. v. 44. "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory." Ibid. xxv. 31.

"How is it written of the Son of man, that he must suffer many things and be set at naught." Mark. xix. 12. "The Son of man is delivered into the hands of men." Ibid. v. 31. "The Son of man must suffer many things and be rejected of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be slain, and be raised the third day." Luke ix. 22. "The Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them." Ibid. v. 56. "Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth." Luke xviii. 8. "But Jesus said unto him, Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" Ibid. xxii. 48. "When ye have lifted up the Son of man, then shall ye know that I am he, and that I do nothing of myself; but as my Father has taught me, I speak these things." John viii. 28. "The hour is come that the Son of man should be glorified." Ibid. xii. 23. "The people answered him, We have heard out of the law that Christ abideth forever; and how sayest thou, The Son of man must be lifted up? who is this Son of man?" Ibid. v 34. These are a few among the many times the phrase is repeated in the writings of the New Testament, and we are led to ask, as did the people of that day, "Who is this Son of man?"

We read that "when the fulness of time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons." If, as the apostle says, he was "made of a woman," in what did he differ from the rest of mankind? Was he an embodiment of the Adamic nature perfected, or was he a new creation? To the former of these queries we reply, that if the Christ was the literal, lineal progeny of Joseph by Mary, his mother, an affirmative reply would be true, and he only differed from his contemporaries and his ancestors in the perfection of his works and of his life; while, if the latter is true, if Joseph is ignored as his father, and he is a new creation, a large field is opened for investigation. In discussing the foregoing questions the status of his parents, begettal, relations and his life history (past and prophetic) enter as essential factors.

Parents. That Mary of Galilee was the mother of the Christ, it is presumed none will deny. Even rank infidelity accepts the fact as historically true, and no one ventures to teach any other than Mary as his mother, if we except perhaps, the impious, so-called revelations of Andrew Jackson Davis and his class, who scurrilously claimed to have received revelations from the spirit-world, to the effect that Christ was the illegitimate son of the Princess of Idumea; that Herod was his sire, and that the works he wrought were the result of legerdemain and magic arts, of which he had become the master while wandering in the east. The lineal descent of Mary from Adam through Abraham and David is given by Luke in the 3rd chapter, but it fails to show her true relations to humanity.

It will be remembered that when Adam and Eve were created and placed in the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it, a law was given them for their trial and as a test of their obedience. The woman (being deceived) transgressed the law, but the man transgressed it wilfully and knowingly. This Paul declares to Timothy. He says, "Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression. Notwithstanding she shall be saved in child bearing, if they continue in faith and charity and holiness with sobriety." 1 Tim. ii. 13–15. The testimony of the woman immediately after the act was "The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat." Gen. iii. 13. A remarkable difference will be observed in the language of the sentence passed upon the man and that used toward the woman. To him it was said, "Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife" (undeceived) "and hast eaten of the tree of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field; in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return." To the deceived woman was said, "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children: and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee." Gen. iii. 16.

A distinction is marked throughout all the Scriptures between the sin of wilful disobedience and sin through ignorance; thus, "And if any soul sin through ignorance, then he shall bring a she goat of the first year for a sin offering. And the priest shall make an atonement for the soul that sinneth ignorantly, when he sinneth by ignorance before the Lord, to make an atonement for him; and it shall be forgiven him. Ye shall have one law for him that sinneth through ignorance, both for him that is born among the children of Israel, and for the stranger that sojourneth among them. But the soul that doeth aught presumptuously, whether he be born in the land, or a stranger, the same reproacheth the Lord; and that soul shall be cut off from among his people. Because he hath despised the word of the Lord, and hath broken his commandment, that soul shall utterly be cut off: his iniquity shall be upon him." Num. xv. 27–31.

The same difference may be recognized in the writings of Paul, "For if we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries. He that despised Moses' law died without mercy under two or three witnesses; of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy who hath trodden under foot the Son of God," etc. Heb. x. 29.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR,

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked: eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

"FIRST DEATH IN OUR FAMILY."

It was on the 24th of Feb. last, that death visited the pleasant home and happy family of Mr. and Mrs. Freeman H. L. Cotten, of Eau Claire, Wisconsin, a beautiful city located on the banks of the Chippewa and Eau Claire Rivers. On the morning of Saturday Feb. 27th, the ground was hidden by the deep snow, and the air was piercing cold, that a funeral procession was seen leaving the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Cotten, and not far away it turned into a quite, sparsely-settled "grave-yard." It was evidently new, yet tastefully laid out into lots, with alleys and roadways for the convenience of visitors.

The "grave-yard" is not a large one, so it was not long ere the head of the procession halted opposite a pile of fresh earth, and the persons on the sleighs got out and gathered around it. Soon a coffin was slowly lowered into the new-made beautiful grave, the grave being made beautiful by its draped lining.

The sexton moved a light shovel full of dirt and dropped it on the box beneath, sending a chill through the nerves of all present. The minister repeated many beautiful words, in fitting tones, then pronounced the usual benediction; after which the crowd moved away to their conveyances.

Two persons, however, remained gazing tearfully into the still open grave, as if fixed there. It was "Freeman" and "Kate." There at the bottom of the grave lay their darling "Gertrude" whom they would, but could not, bring back to life again.

It seemed hard for them to leave her there, in the cold ground, while they returned home cheerless and heart-broken, each day to be reminded of their loss by the absence of the brave little girl whose prattle and busy feet were sounds as familiar as they had been unceasing. Gertrude was their first born and only child, she was a bright little girl, not quite two years old, full of childish fancies, and fun, a sunbeam in mortal flesh, sent to gladden, and then, alas! sadden their hearts. Gertrude was not only loved by her parents, but by all that had ever known her, for she was such a sweet and obedient child, making friends with every one that came in contact with her. Her relatives and friends deeply mourn her loss.

LETTER FROM MISS FINKELSTEIN,

JERUSALEM.

JERUSALEM, April 26.

Dear Mr. Dunlop:

Here am I safe and sound in my native city, and snatch a few moments to write you a line. "The Lord bless thee out of Zion," is my earnest prayer. We arrived here last week, and I was very much pleased to receive your very welcome favor of the 19th of March, and Herald. My time, however, has been so taken up with seeing my old friends that I have hardly had time, as it were, to breathe, and have not written any letters because, besides seeing friends and places, we have so much horseback riding to do in the broiling sun, that at the close of the day I am so tired as to be glad to get to bed. Every day there is somewhere to go, such as Bethlehem, Hebron, etc., then the trip to the Jordan and the Dead Sea on foot. It is impossible to write much in travelling, or rather, I should say, especially so when one is revisiting one's native land. I have been intending to write you every day, but kept putting it off from time to time, till this morning I determined to do it; so I rose before sunrise, and as I am now writing, the sun is just rising over the Mount of Olives.

We are encamped just outside the city walls on the northwestern side. It is impossible for me to express the emotions that sweep over my soul as I look upon the scenes so familiar to me from my infancy. Sometimes I am almost overwhelmed, as I look upon the Jews who have clustered around their once favored Zion, now trodden down, and, especially as I see them at their wailing-place! The great devotion which characterizes them is very touching. My earnest prayer is, O! that they could see him who died to redeem the whole world. But the time is not far distant we hope, when all shall know the Lord. A great responsibility rests upon us Christians to do the utmost to promote this knowledge.

O! what a debt the Western world owes to this country! You there are enjoying the full, glorious light of the gospel, and this land lies under a very dark shadow.

We leave for Damascus in a day or two, up the country. The weather is almost too warm, but still we usually get a fine breeze in the afternoons. I have had a number of callers since I began writing this letter, and consequently I have been obliged to write in a disconnected manner, which I know you will pardon. There is so much waste of time in Oriental greetings, that I don't get time to do anything else. If you address me to Jaffa,

HOWARD'S HOTEL,
Jaffa, Syria,

I shall be able to hear from you before I leave the country, on our return from Damascus.

With kindest regards to all your Committee, and wishing you all every blessing, and hoping soon to be amongst you, I remain your sister in Christ,

Conference Reports.

The second quarterly conference of the Church of God met, as before announced, at Dutton, Mich., beginning Friday evening, May 28, and from beginning to end it was not only a grand success but more than a usual amount of interest was manifested. By the urgent request of the brethren, Brother Dwiggins, of Indiana, was present. Brethren Winchester, B. W. Woodand K. N. Woodward, son of B. W. Woodward, each spoke once, Brother Dwiggins doing the remainder of the preaching. We had utterly despaired of Dutton, believing the Lord had ceased to strive with the people here, but some time ago a Miss Malna came here and the people have been gradually awakening to their souls' welfare, and when Brother Dwiggins began in his earnest, enthusiastic, Christian manner to tell them the story of the kingdom and the things concerning Jesus Christ, they believed and some gladly obeyed. On Monday Brother Woodward baptised seven into His blessed name. The meetings were so interesting that Brother Dwiggins was persuaded to continue them until Wednesday evening. Thursday morning four more obeyed. Brother Dwiggins has done a blessed work here; the brethren will ever remember him and pray God that he may soon return to finish the work only just begun. It is also their prayers that he and Brother Woodward may be always as successful in their proposed evangelical work when they will begin (D. V.) immediately after the Antioch conference. Brother Lemon, our President, with a large attendance of other brethren, was present, and all returned to their homes praising God and magnifying his holy name. A church organization was effected consisting of 13 members.

A Letter Read at the Michigan Conference.

MILLBROOK, Mich., May 23, 1886.

To the brethren and sisters assembled in Conference at Dutton, Mich:

In looking over our beloved RESTITUTION I find an appointment of a Conference to be held at Dutton, and knowing that circumstances will not permit me to be with you in person, I thought I would write you a few lines this afternoon to let you know that the blessed hope comforts and cheers the hearts of some that are not permitted to meet with you in conference.

Yes, ours is truly a blessed hope. We are expecting according to the promise that Jesus will come and we may see him, and hold conversation with him, claim and have his attention while we pour in his ear the thanks which our hearts feel; and hear from his own lips the story of his love. Dear brothers and sisters, did you ever think what your first thoughts or words will be when you see him? I don't mean "when every eye shall see him." I don't mean when he is associated with "all the holy angels." I do not mean when "thousands and tens of thousands minister unto him." No, not then.

I ask again, what will be your first words to our blessed Lord? Sometime, the first time, when we are apart from the throng, by ourselves, when we have his attention, his hand in ours, his right arm encircling us, sitting by his side, his loving eyes beaming on us, how my heart thrills with love as I contemplate such a visit with Jesus. I have tried to tell him my joys and griefs, hopes and fears all the way along ever since I become in anywise acquainted with him, away back in Wayne Co. N. Y. 32 years ago, but I have (sorry to say) had also to tell him of so many faults and failures, and crave his pardon and ask his patience and help so many times that I do know I feel that "Jesus loves even me," else I should not be permitted to hope through his dear name, and since I have become better acquainted with him and his work the better I love him, the easier it is to serve him. When we see him we will tell him all. We can do it better then than now.

Dear ones we have each of us passed some rough spots and hard places in our past lives, but Jesus has looked on with interest, and when we have asked trustingly for help it has come.

Perhaps we may not always know what is best for us, but he will do the best thing for us if we trustingly follow directions. Another thing about this blessed hope. It wont be long before Gentile rule will be over. Our Jesus will assume the right to take the government of the whole world and the result of his management of the affair will be the removal of the curse and all its effects, and every tongue shall confess that our Jesus is the Lord of all the earth. How this confession will magnify and glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. God has been interested in our salvation from Eden clear through until it is finally accomplished. There are strange things happening just now, and will happen until Jesus comes. Men of the world are scared, [hearts fail them for fear]. The outlook is sad for them. But these things tell us [for they are foretold] our journey is most over. Jesus will come and the times of the Gentile end. Dear ones things have gone wrong a great while. So many things need fixing over, [making new] kings and rulers have managed badly so long it is hard to tell with our present judgment and knowledge of right and wrong, just where the right line should be drawn. Jesus manifested great wisdom the short time he was with us, and he surely has no less wisdom then than now. He will make things right while he reigns so they will stay right, for he will "bind their kings with chains and their nobles with fetters of iron to execute upon them the judgment written. This honor hath allhis saints, praise ye the Lord."

I pity those who have no hope of a better life and surroundings than the present. Be faithful dear ones. Be patient with erring ones. Our Father is patient with us. Jesus left the glory he had with the Father for us. We are worth saving else he would not have done and suffered so much for us. He wants you and I to be associated with him in the judgment and management of affairs. It will be for his glory to associate us with him as also it will be the Father's to have associated Jesus in the great work of salvation with himself. Oh my heart thrills with love for him and his work and plan of salvation. I long to see Jesus and enjoy your society with all the redeemed in the kingdom.

Where the faded flowers shall freshen,
Freshen nevermore to fade,
Where the shaded skies shall brighten,
Brighten nevermore to shade;
Where the sun blaze never scorches
Where the star beams cease to shine,
Where no tempest stirs the echoes
Of the wood or moor or hill;
Where the morn shall wake in gladness
And the noon the joy prolong,
Where the daylight dies in fragrance
'Mid the burst of holy song.

Where no shadow shall bewilder,
Where life's vain parade is o'er;
Where the sleep of sin is broken,
And the dreamer dreams no more;
Where the heart is never severed,
Partings, sighings, sobs and moans,
Midnight waking, twilight weeping,
Heavy mornfide all are done;
Where the child has found its mother,
Where the mother finds her child,
Where dear families are gathered
That were scattered on the wild.

Where the hidden wound is healed,
Where the blighted life reblooms,
Where the smitten heart, the freshness
Of its buoyant youth resumes
Where the love that here we lavish
On the withering leaves of time,
Shall have fadeless flowers to fix on,
In the ever spring-bright clime;
Where we find the joy of loving
As we never loved before;
Loving on unchilled, unhindered,
Loving once and evermore.

Where a blighted world shall brighten
Underneath a bluer sphere,
And a new, yet greater anthem
Shall be hailing splendor here,
Where earth's barren vales shall blossom,
Putting on her robe of green,
And a purer, fairer Eden,
Be where only wastes have been,
Where a King, in kingly glory,
Such as earth has never known,
Shall assume the righteous sceptre,
Claim and wear the holy crown.

From your brother in Christ awaiting his return.

A NOTE ON TIME WORTH KNOWING.

A timely word on time is, of course, timely. The great Creator delayed to create "the second day" till he had taken time to name the first and distinguish "between the day and the night"—an example of accuracy in all accounts, a right start as to all number and order in earth and heaven. Then the "six days" succeed in their course and were succeeded by the Sabbath, a rest from labor, all ordered on time! Thus we have the clue to "the seven Sabbaths" that in after generations reached "the Pentecost." Nay more, the sabbatic year (after six of toil) was succeeded by "seven sabbatic years, or 49 years," surmounted by "the jubilee."

I. Rising now above this order of events in more days and years, into the order of the ages, we find that "the Edeh age" embraced probation, failure, and ended in judgment, with loss of Eden and man's subjection to toil and death.

II. The ante-diluvian age of promise with the ordinance of sacrifice culminated in "the deluge!" "A few, eight souls, saved by water in the ark!"

III. The Noahic age, with a vast enlargement of "the promise," confirmed by the "rainbow covenant," "by seed time and harvest," and all the demonstrations of divine oversight and "good will to men," which yet availed not to secure man's obedience. Hence as "when they knew God they glorified him not as God, he gave them up to their own way in idolatry and death." Rom. i. 18–26.

IV. The Abrahamic (Patriarchal) age opened with a new departure. Abraham adhering to God was taken into covenant relation, "that in him and his seed he should bless all the nations of the earth!" Gen. xii. to xxii. 18. It was to be done in his sovereign love and mercy to man and earth. Rom. iv.; Gal. iii.; Rom. viii.; 1 Cor. xv.

V. The Mosaic age; the law, psalms and prophets followed in the line of Abraham's son "Isaac, the child of promise," whose posterity had amounted to millions; and being oppressed in Egypt they were delivered by "the stretched out arm of the Lord" and constituted "the figure-shadow, example, of that which is to come." But yielding to the subtlety of Satan, the power of darkness, their end also was judgment on Jerusalem, with a remnant dispersed, to demonstrate divine sovereignty over all things and to accomplish his will, preparatory in promise to "the ever glorified future."

VI. The Messianic gospel age was inaugurated by "God in the fulness of time, sending forth his Son," heralded by the angel message, the angel anthem. John the Baptist and Christ himself proclaiming, The time is fulfilled, the kingdom of God is at hand; repent ye and believe the gospel! this time given, Dan. ix. 24–26, reached there!

Note. Jewish rejection was the occasion for Gentile calling, to take from them "a people for his name." Matt. xxi. 43. Thus "the times of the Gentiles," embracing Rome, the fourth and last of earthly empires, will end up in judgment and the kingdom of Christ with his saints, the kingdom of God! It is the crowning consummation of "glory to God and good will to men!" The promise all fulfilled, the prayer for the kingdom all answered, and divine vision verified, in paradise restored and all again good! That angels, principalities and powers may see how good the creature is that God takes pleasure in!

It seems that earth is God's model world to educate the universe! It has taken time at each advance, replete with wisdom and power, and never will one know her "blessed and only Potentate" save in "his own times." R. V. 1 Tim. vi. 13–16.

However reserved the ultimate time is, the terms in Scripture that fill it out so far occur some 4000 times! Yet, it remains "of that day and hour no one knoweth." Matt. xxiv. 36. But what is given to us to know is to aid and sustain us in our watching attitude. Amen. The antitypical Sabbath remains to the people of God! Heb. iv. 9.

J. B. COOK.

P. S. The more I learn of God's ways and times, the nearer it brings Christ's coming to my mind and heart, because it reconciles me to his loving ways in educating us. In Brother Peter's incomparable work, vol. iii. p. 99, he notes the names of prophetic students and chronologists at length, and thus we see that (in the light of promise, "the wise shall understand," Dan. xii. 10,) the overwhelming evidence is all against delay. Amen. With sorrow I learn that Brother Peters is not getting the needed returns for his life's labor, hence some good steward of God's good gifts may bless themselves by acting on the promise, "one hundredfold for this life," and on and on forever. Amen.

THE DIVINE PURPOSE IN THE RECONCILIATION OF MEN, AND ITS HUMAN CONDITIONS.

"You, that were once alienated, and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath He reconciled in the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable, and unreprovable in His sight, if you continue in the faith grounded and settled and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel."—Col. i. 21-23.

This Christian ideal of the possibilities for men is the noblest vision that can animate our hopes. Absolute moral purity which shall be recognized as perfect by perfect Judge, and a close approach of God, so as that we shall be "before him;" in a manner unknown here, are hopes as much brighter than those which any other system of belief prints on the dim canvas curtain of the future, as the Christian estimate of man's condition apart from Christ is sadder and darker than theirs.

Nothing short of this complete purity and blamelessness satisfies God's heart. It delights him thus to effect the purifying of sinful souls, and he is glad when he sees himself surrounded by spirits thus echoing his will and reflecting his light. This is what he longs for. The work of Christ is the means to that end, and when God has got us by such lavish expenditure, to be white like himself, and can find nothing in us to condemn, then, and not till then, does he brood over us as satisfied and glad at heart, resting in his love, and rejoicing over us with singing.

Nor will anything short of this complete purity exhaust the power of the Reconciling Christ, his cross and passion reach no adequate result short of the perfecting of saints.

We ought, then, to keep this very clear before us as the crowning object of Christianity; not to make men happy, except as a consequence of holiness; not to deliver from penalty, except as a means to holiness; but to make them holy, and being holy, to set them close by the throne of God.

Nothing less than an absolute purity will satisfy God about us. Nothing less should satisfy ourselves. Let us make it our life's business to see that that end is being accomplished in us to some tolerable and growing measure.

The human conditions of this grand result are:—"If so be that you continue in the faith, grounded, and steadfast, and not moved away from the hope of the gospel."

There is an "if," then. However great the powers of Christ and of his work, however deep the desire and fixed purpose of God, no fulfilment of these is possible except on condition of our habitual exercise of faith. Mind, heart, and will must be exercised on Christ, or all his power to purify and bless, will be of no avail to us. There is nothing mystical about the matter. Common sense tells us, that if a man never thinks about the truth, that truth will do him no good in any way. If it does not find its road into his heart through his mind, and thence into his life, it is all one to him as if there were no such truth, or as if he did not believe it. If our creed is made up of truths which we do not think about, we may just as well have no creed.

Nothing but the continual exercise of faith, day by day, will secure the continual entrance into our weakness of the strength which makes strong and the purity which makes pure.

Then again, if our lives are to be firm and stable, we must have a foundation outside of ourselves on which to rest. That thought is involved in the word "grounded" or "founded." That foundation is the Lord Jesus himself. He is "the rock," builded on which, our fleeting and fickle selves may become rock-like too, and every impulsive and changeable Simon Bar Jonas rise to the mature steadfastness of a Peter.

Let our minds find in him, in his Word, and whole revealing life, the basis of our beliefs, the materials for thought; let our hearts find in him their object, which brings calmness and unchangeableness into their love; let our practical energies take him as their motive and pattern, their strength and their aim, their stimulus and their reward; let all hopes and joys, emotions and desires, fasten themselves on him; let him occupy and fill our whole nature, and mould and preside over all our actions. So shall we be founded on Christ.—"Alexr. Maclaren, D. D., in "The Expositor." for July, 1886.

Prince Luitpold, uncle to the late and present King, who assumed the regency a few days ago on the declaration of Ludwig's insanity, and now retires, is the next heir to the throne. The insanity of Ludwig and the condition resembling insanity in Otto are hereditary, many other members of the family having been similarly affected.

Asleep.

The fairies are blessing on the hill
Where tender grass is green;—
And low beneath the chirping leaves
Arbutus buds are seen.

Above the dainty, new-made nest,
The brown wren pours her song;
And robbins in the apple tree
Are chirping all day long.

The freshly quickened pulse of life
Is beating everywhere,
From hidden seed to blushing blooms,
Whose fragrance fills the air.

But other springtime, just as fair
In leaf and flower as this,
Heed not the graves which hide away
The presence that we miss.

Beneath the greening sod they sleep,
Unmoved by Spring's sweet breath.
Give ear, O heart, unto this word:
"I will redeem from death."

They sleep where thou hast slept, O Christ!
The first fruits from the grave;
Yea, from the dust they shall arise
For thou hast power to save.

A Son Breaking His Mother's Heart.

Several weeks ago a woman went to a police station to lay a charge against her son, whose bad conduct had become so intolerable that she could no longer endure it. It was evident to the officers that she was greatly excited and distressed, and an officer was sent with her to her home, where the rebellious boy then was, for the purpose of arresting him. Her agitation increased as they were on the way, and suddenly she threw up her arms, and cried out, "Oh God! my heart is breaking!" fell upon the sidewalk, and died within a few minutes. When the son who had been the cause of her death was placed under arrest, and told that his mother was dead, he threw himself upon the body, and in the wildest agony cried to her for forgiveness, and cursed himself as the cause of her death. But it was too late. "This was a case in which there was no place for repentance, though it was sought bitterly with tears. The poor heart whose grief had broken it, was forever still, and to him remains the bitter memory of his own recklessness as the cause. How many boys are pursuing a similar course, and are yet to learn that no amount of fruitless repentance which comes after the event can heal hearts their vices have broken, or restore the shattered fortune their dissipation has wrecked!"—Evangelical Messenger.

Dear Children:

On the sweet Sabbath, just as Jesus was leaving the temple, "hiding himself in the throng because the Jews sought to stone him," while passing by he saw a poor, blind beggar. He halted a moment, spat on the ground and made an ointment which he spread on the eyes of the blind man, and said, "Go, wash in the pool which signifies Sent." The blind man had always lived in a dark world, had never seen one beam of the beautiful sun, nor looked upon the dear faces of those whom he loved. He could hardly hope that his sight would be given him because he was born blind. Probably the tender sympathies of those who passed by had been appealed to many times before, and perhaps some had grown weary while listening to his mournful tale, especially as they considered he or his parents had sinned, which they thought caused his blindness. But Jesus plainly told his disciples that sin had not caused it, but that the wonderful works of God should be made manifest, for Jesus knew it was not the will of his heavenly Father who had made man a perfect organization, that any should be blind, lame or diseased, and he called it the work of God to give the blind sight. It is seldom a child is born blind, which made the case more remarkable. He did as Jesus commanded and came seeing.

Jesus could have cured him without telling him to "Go and wash," but God's way which manifested Jesus as the true light of the world would not have been unfolded. Imagine the poor beggar, in a state of blindness, groping his way to the healing waters, which were sent of God to give him light, with his withered eyes all covered over with mud, which when dry would have made him feel very uncomfortable, and doubtless he would have thought, this is a strange way to do, for Jesus had not told him he should receive his sight, and he may have never entertained an idea of the kind. What a precious gift! How truly wonderful must the first beautiful beam have appeared to him; light flowing in with all its varied objects on his once lifeless, sightless eyes. Truly in this case Jesus was found of one who sought him not.

The Jews could not believe he was the same poor, blind man who sat by the way begging; therefore they asked his parents. They said, we know he is our son and was born blind, but by what means he now seeth we know not; he is of age, ask him. Then said the Jews again to him: what did he to thee? How opened he thine eyes? He answered, I have told you already and ye did not hear. Wherefore would ye hear it again? Will ye also be his disciples? And they cast him out of the synagogue.

Jesus heard they had excommunicated him, and when he found him he said to him, Dost thou believe on the Son of God? He answered, Who is he Lord that I might believe on him? Jesus said, Thou hast both seen him and it is he that talketh with thee. And he said, Lord I believe, and he worshipped him. The blessed Redeemer not only imparted natural sight but gifted him with spiritual understanding, which guided him into life eternal. The sheep hear the good Shepherd's voice and follow him.

Your affectionate teacher,

E. COTTMAN.

Prophetic Problems, Metallic Image, Gentile Domination. Dan. ii. 31, 46.

We propose, in this article, to discuss the vision of the Metallic Image, Dan. ii. 31, 46. In this image we have a visible embodiment of the four Gentile Monarchies. Its members are composed of four pure metals, and a metal-clay mixture. The first three are pure metals, and symbolize three universal monarchies. The fourth kingdom, in its greatest strength, was represented by pure iron; in its weakness, and divided state, by a mixture of iron and clay.

The image is not a living organism, since it is composed of gold, silver, brass, iron and clay, substances without life. The wealth, and strength of four great empires are symbolized. The four beasts of Dan. vii. 1, 7, represent living agents and their mission. The first three divisions of the Image, will require, at present, but a passing notice. 1. The head of gold is interpreted to be the first kingdom; 2. the breast and arms of silver, the second kingdom, which history demonstrates to be the Medo-Persian; 3, the belly and thighs of brass, the third kingdom, the Macedonian or Grecian, which was to have universal dominion. So far expositors very generally agree. We therefore pass on to notice the fourth image division, the lower members, the legs of pure iron; and the feet and toes, of an iron-clay mixture.

The four pure metals are distinctly interpreted, and symbolize four universal monarchies. Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greco-Macedonia, and Rome during the domination of the Roman family. This Roman dynasty, was succeeded by a mixed people German and Roman, or Romano-German (A. D. 800.) The clay, or German element, is interpreted to represent an element of weakness, as pure iron is a symbol of strength, partly strong and partly weak-broken. Let us look at the image in its individual members, composed of two classes (1) interpreted, (and therefore symbolic); (2) assumed (such as are not named, or simply named but not interpreted.) Our position is this:—1. Every symbolic member is fully interpreted, as the head, breast and arms, belly and thighs, legs, feet and toes; 2. Those not interpreted, are assumed, such as eyes, ears, nose, mouth, hands and fingers. Of the interpreted members, many things are assumed. Let us illustrate more fully our meaning. The head of gold is interpreted, and is therefore, symbolic; that it has two eyes, two ears, a nose and a mouth, (and members) is assumed, they have no symbolic meaning; neither are we sure that the head was in possession of those organs of the senses. The head is interpreted: the six members are assumed. 2. The breast and arms (as a whole) are interpreted, its arms being two, its two hands, and ten fingers, are assumed; these points are of no symbolic import, since they are not named.

3. The belly and thighs a section of the image, have a symbolic meaning since they are interpreted to represent a third kingdom, universal. That it had two thighs and only two is assumed; not stated. Neither is it quite certain that the image was in human shape. 4. Its legs (plural not dual), pure iron, as a section of the image, are symbolic. Since they are interpreted; but, that there were two legs, and only two; the one western, the other eastern, is pure assumption, not stated; taken for granted, without proof. 5. Its feet and toes, part of potters' clay, and part of iron, are symbolic. "The kingdom" (Roman) shall be divided, (one kingdom) but there shall be in it of the strength of the iron (pure iron) Roman dynasty, forasmuch as thou sawest the iron mixed with miry clay, but that there were two feet, an eastern foot, and a western foot, and only two, is an assumption; it is not stated. Why not, if the number is symbolic?

And (as) the toes of the feet (were) part of iron, and part of clay, (so) the kingdom shall be partly strong and partly broken, and whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men: but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed (chemically) with clay. Simply a mechanical mixture. The toes as the extreme members of the image, as a mixture are symbolic, since they are interpreted; but, that there are ten toes, five on the eastern foot and five on the western foot) and only ten, is an assumption, that they symbolize ten kingdoms, is an extreme assumption, and yet it is said, "The ten toes of the image cover the whole territory of the Roman Empire at the time of Christ's open manifestation to destroy his enemies. They are just as broad in extent, as both legs and both feet in their application and dominion." Will any one please inform us where the prophet uses the expression "ten toes," "both feet," "both legs?" If the toes cover the whole Roman territory, what territory do the feet and legs cover? Since "the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, are broken to pieces together?" "That the image had feet and toes is part of the divine record, but that it had two of the former and ten of the latter is not stated: and to attempt to found an argument on such an unwarranted assumption is unsafe. The image is named by sections; head, (gold,) breast and arms (silver); belly and thighs (brass); legs (pure iron); feet and toes (iron and clay mixture). Each section is interpreted, and has its symbolic meaning.

Section 1. is the head of gold, interpreted to be a kingdom, Babylonian. The head is assumed to have eyes, ears, a nose and a mouth; yet, if it has, they are of no prophetic significance, or they would be named and interpreted. Section 2. is the silver breast and arms. In this section, it may be assumed that there are two arms; and that each arm has a hand, with a thumb and four fingers. As to these, however, the record is silent; and we have a right to say, that, if there, they have no symbolic meaning, and are, therefore, of no consequence. The record (symbolic) is complete without them. Section 3. contains two members, the belly and thighs of brass. It may be assumed, (for it is not stated) that the thighs are two and only two. But, to build an important argument upon this assumption, based upon another (an eastern and a western thigh), and that they have no special meaning in the third empire, is by no means logical. The thighs (the number not being stated), are simply a part of the third section, having no separate signification. The belly and thighs, are symbolic as a whole. Section 4. consists of two parts, (1) the legs; (2) the feet and toes.

(1) The legs (not two legs), are iron (unmixed with clay). The unmixed, or pure iron is the proper symbol of the first parts; and not the two. To affirm that the legs are two, and that they symbolic the two divisions (Latin and Greek) of the fourth, or Roman empire, is an assumption by no means warranted. For, if the legs, (Roman Empire) separated, have any symbolic signification, so, also must the thighs (Greek Empire). The legs together symbolize the Roman family, the iron the old Roman race: the iron and clay mixture, would symbolize a mixed dynasty, clay being a symbol of a dynastic race that introduces division, and consequently, weakness into the old iron empire.

2. The second part of section iv. includes the feet (not two feet) and toes (not ten toes). Their symbolic peculiarity, is the mixture of clay with iron, interpreted to be an element of weakness and division, clay, in its nature, being mixed with iron, would make the compound weaker than the pure iron. That is very distinctly the import of the clay as a symbol. The clay, first appearing in the feet, continues to divide and weaken the iron (Roman family) of the fourth empire, to its extremity. There is no intimation, whatever, in the interpretation, that the image represents any other than the four universal Gentile Monarchies, the four generic empires of Gentile domination. The image is Generic.

The image stands as a whole, without life or action; a photograph of Gentile Rule, a silent lifeless image of earth's dynasties. We have said that the image is Generic. Why, we shall explain. When God had made the earth, he furnished and prepared it for the dominion of the first man, (Adam). The probationary loss of that dominion, gave occasion for the promise of the transfer of said dominion to one who should undertake the Restitution of the earth, and a family—Messiah the Son of God. Hence the original dominion became divided into two orders, each order being a dynasty. One order is the family of the first Adam, and in the time of Daniel was symbolized by the metallic image; the other order is Messiah and his family, symbolized by the stone increased to a mountain. The idea is presented by Christ, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world"; given to Adam, and lost by transgression. The original dominion, has, therefore, two orders, according to the number of dominating families, that of the first Adam and of Messiah, the last Adam, the first and the last; the one the dominating family of the age; the other the Lord and Prince of the Coming and endless age. The symbols of these two orders of dominion are the Metallic Image and the stone increased to a mountain. We are now discussing the first order of the dominion, the Metallic Image. That order has four Generic divisions only, viz., the four Gentile monarchies. The fourth monarchy becomes weakened by the introduction of a foreign element. Now it is very clear, that this vision, in its regal divisions, is simply Generic, it does not recognize any royal species. This more minute division belongs to the vision of Dan. vii. That this is true, will be evident by reviewing the structure of the image. 1. The head of gold may have lesser members, but they are not noticed. "Thou (thy kingdom) art this head of gold." Babylon held dominion over many lesser kingdoms yet they have no place in this vision. 2. The second kingdom had two lesser kingdoms, that of the Medes (the older), and that of the Persian (the younger and the more powerful), still the vision, being generic takes no notice of them, they being reserved, as sub-species, for another vision (Dan. viii. 3. 3. The third kingdom, had in it two very distinct families, the Grecians proper, and the Macedonians, yet, the vision of the metallic image does not recognize them, though it partly appears in another vision, Dan. viii. 5, 21, 22. 4. The fourth kingdom in the vision of Dan. ii. takes notice of divisions by foreign elements, viz., that of clay, which is in the feet as well as the toes a symbol of weakness the feet and every toe were partly broken. It is introduced, as a symbol of weakness by its mechanical mixture with the strong iron. Clay would make a poor horseshoe, steam engine, cable or bridge; neither would an iron-clay mixture be trusted; the regal specific divisions are reserved for another vision, Dan. vii. 7, 27. Which, by way of illustration, we shall take at present, a passing sketch. We notice the points of contrast between the symbols of this vision, and those of the metallic image. 1. The image has no life; it is a simple picture or photograph of what were to be living powers, ruling the earth by bloody violence:—composed of five inanimate substances, gold, silver, brass, iron, and clay. Acted upon by the living stone, it is ground to dust, and, by the winds, carried away. In what remarkable contrast is Daniel's vision of the sea-monsters of the vii. chapter. All life and action. Even their mother, the great sea, infuses into them her own restless nature. Let us for a moment examine her stormy ocean brood.

(a) The first born was a sea-lion, with eagle's wings, the Babylonian kingdom is evidently symbolized, and the lion, the king of beasts, is substituted for gold, the inanimate royal metal. Specific attributes are added, strength of the iron, and the swiftness of an eagle; and its overthrow by the Persians distinctly seen. No specific kingdoms are brought to view under the lion symbol.

(b) The second birth from the sea was a monster resembling a bear, Raising itself from on one side with three ribs in its mouth, its mission was to devour much flesh. This animal, living and all-devouring is the substitute of the silver of the image. Its specific features are named. (c). The third birth of the sea, is a monster like a leopard, yet with four wings and four heads, specific attributes are named, yet no subordinate kingdom appears under the symbol. It is the substitute of the brass of the image. What life and action appears? (d) The fourth birth is a frightful sea-monster, no beast on earth resembling it. It is in the place of the iron, and the iron-clay mixture of the image. We shall notice its generic and specific symbols. The monster, as one living organism, is generic, the fourth of the metallic image. We now come to notice some Regal species, some lesser kingdoms, that come upon the sea-monster [4th] growing out of it as horns out of animals. The fourth beast was a symbol of the Latin kingdom, though it exceeded its dominion over the territory originally and properly belonging to the third or old Greek Empire, which had two periods of prophetic existence, Dan. viii. 23. We must distinguish between the life and dominion of beasts, [kingdoms.] Beasts have their dens, their homes where they live, and their hunting-grounds where they exercise dominion. The three beasts lived, while the fourth beast dominated over their territory; for it is said, "As concerning the rest [3] of the beasts they had their dominion taken away; yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time."—Dan. vii. 12.

The territory, proper, of the fourth beast [Latin kingdom], is western Europe, eastern Europe being the Grecian territory. The ten horns were on the fourth, or Latin beast, and must therefore, have been located on Latin territory. If on the Greek territory they would have been horns of the third beast, [Greek Empire]. Failing to note this distinction, authors have committed very serious blunders. Let it be kept in view, that each of the four empires had its home farm, or original territory. There it grew up and lived. Each one in turn, as England, over its colonies, exercised dominion over the territory belonging by right, to the other primary kingdoms. The ten horns belonging to the Latin beast, born on Latin territory not Italy alone, but western Europe the territory of the Latin [not Greek] Empire:—the Empire that used the Latin language, the empire that till A. D. 800, was under the iron [Latin or Roman;] after that, the Roman, German, [iron-clay] dynasty, which has continued to be the ruling dynasty to the present time. 1. Dominion is the undivided rule over the earth—under the heavens.

2. The dominion has two orders, the rule of the first Adam and his family, and the rule of the second Adam and his family. The symbol of the first order is the Metallic Image; the symbol of the second order, is the stone increased to a great mountain. 3. The other lesser kingdoms symbolized by horns are species. The first order has four general [no species, named] and is, therefore, Generic. These genera, in the vii. chapter, are divided into species denoted by horns. The ten horns, and the horns are symbolic and fully explained; they exercise distinct agencies as kingdoms. Coming up after the ten horns and in the midst of them is a little horn. It was, therefore the eleventh horn on the head of the Latin, or fourth beast, [the western Roman empire.] According to this vision, and that of the image, if the toes and horns are the same there should be eleven toes, and these on the Latin foot, for the kingdoms are on the Latin territory.

We give two lists of those kingdoms; Bishop Newton, numbers them as follows. 1, The senate of Rome. 2. Ravenna. 3. The Lombards. 4. The Huns. 5. The Alemani. 6. The Franks. 7. The Burgundians. 8. The Goths. 9. The Britons. 10. The Saxons.

According to Machiavel, and Bishop Lloyd, they were the Huns in Hungary A. D. 756. 2. The Ostrogoths in Mesia 377. 3. The Visigoths in Pannonia, 378. 4. The Sueves and Alans in Gascoigne and Spain, 407. 5. The Vandals in Africa, 407. 6. The Franks in France, 407. 7. The Burgundians in Burgundy, 407. 8. The Lombards, first upon the Danube, 526, and afterwards in Italy. 9. The Heruli and Turingi in Italy, 476. 10. The Saxons and Angles in Britain, 467. These kingdoms grew upon Latin territory; upon the soil of the fourth Generic empire, and not upon the Greek division of the universal Roman empire. One point as to the original seats or homes of the four Metallic symbol empires, claims attention.

1. Babylonia is the extreme East end of the belt of empires. 2. Media and Persia, are located to the north and west. 3. Greece and Macedonia west of Persia. 4. Rome the seat of the Italian empire, or more properly, of the Latin monarchy occupies the extreme west. This is the track of the second or Gothic emigration, the pathway of the banished ten tribes of Israel, the course of the Christian missionaries of Judah and Benjamin, the belt of the four horns that "have scattered Judah, Israel and Jerusalem." Zech. i. 19.

What a remarkable contrast between the symbol composing the image of Dan. ii. 31, 46, and the sea-born Bloodgerls of Dan vii. 2, 23. The one is lifeless, a picture of the riches splendor, intelligence, and strength of four great empires, all in one form, the other is a living exhibition—a menagerie, where each wild beast in turn, goes through the acts of his fixed destiny, a miniature representation of national action.

Note. The stone smote the image on the feet. If the toes are kingdoms, covering the entire Roman earth, why speak of the feet instead of the toes? Being appendages of the feet, and not distinct, they are not named.

Report of Travels.

I left home April 20th for Pierceton, Ind. Called on Brother and Sister Quackenbush, also Sisters Norton and Waldo, and Brother and Sister Galbraith, and visited Brother and Sister Winco, all of whom I found well. I then went with Brother Winco to his appointment at Sister Gulin's where we found all well. Had meeting, Brother Winco preaching in the forenoon and I in the afternoon. I then stayed over another Sunday, preaching at 10:30 a.m. and at three, and lecturing at night on prohibition. Came back to Pierceton and from there went to Gospel Grove where I stayed a few days. Lectured one night at Packerton on prohibition and preached once at Gospel Grove. From there I came to Clinton County, where I now am. I leave here in the morning for Brother Boyds in the west part of the county. Since I have been in this county I have immersed seven into the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of their sins. To God be all the praise.

Since I left home I have had some good meetings. The gospel of Christ is God's power unto salvation to every one that believeth. I intend, the Lord willing, to visit them again some time this summer and preach for them again, as there are others that intend to obey them. May the Lord preserve them till that time. Some of those that obeyed were young women and I pray God they may stand firm in the faith till their work is done. If any of the dear brethren want me to visit them in this State or Illinois while I am out on this trip, they can address me at Paris, Edgar Co., Ill., in care of Azorah M. Scroggs. Love to all the dear ones.

WORK.

"Let him labor working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth."

Here is a divine command: to those who would live in idleness, subsisting on the fruits of others' toil, "Let him labor." Then follows the divine reason for that command. "It is not only that he may in "quietness eat his own bread," but that "he may have to give to him that needeth."

I can never believe it to be right, while we have the strength and health to earn our own living, to let others provide for us. It is disobeying God in at least two particulars, if not more. "He who provides not for his own is worse than an infidel." Strong language that, but it is God's language, God's thought, God's judgment. It is blessed to give, but we cannot give if we do not earn the means to give.

The Phrenological Journal for June, 1886.

The portrait of Sir Richard Cartwright, a prominent Canadian, accompanied by a careful analysis of his character, will interest Kingston citizens and members of the Rideau Club. "Locality" is the subject of "Familiar Talks, No. 6," "Biometry" is still further discussed, "Pictures and Faces" is an important paper, No. 7 of the series on "Handwriting," is profusely illustrated. The ear is considered, by an independent observer, in its relation to character. "Bishop Tegner, the Poet of Sweden," is charmingly written, the accompanying poems bear the marks of faithful, loving study in their translation.

"The San Marcos River," with illustrations, will give the reader a faint idea of that marvel of nature's handiwork. "His Weakness and her Faults," is completed. "Personal Responsibility in Contagious Diseases;" "Physical Development in Relation to the Work of the Ministry," are as instructive as the explanatory titles suggest. The Editorial and Correspondential departments are replete with mental food of good quality. To the student of human nature, the perplexed parent, the earnest teacher, and the aggressive preacher, this number of the Journal has a particular value; in fact every number contains invaluable hints and instructions for every day's using. While aggressive in its teachings, it is noticeable that there is no bigotry displayed, no "I am right, and all the rest of the world is wrong," in its columns. The arguments in favor of Phrenology, Hygiene, etc., are not of the "Shibboleth" class but built after the model recommended by King Solomon. The subscription price is $3.00 per year, or 20 cts. per number.

WAITING FOR THE BRIDEGROOM.

"Surely, I come quickly. Amen: Even so, come, Lord Jesus."—Rev. xxii. 20.

"I am coming, coming quickly:"
'Twas the Master's farewell word:
Keep your lamps well trimmed and burning,
Nor in sloth your loins ungird.

As the thief, with stealing footstep,
In the darkness draweth nigh,
I shall come when men are sleeping:
Terrible the midnight cry!

As from farthest east the lightning
Shineth to the distant west,
Lighting up the hidden valleys,
And the mountain's snowy crest:

So shall be my swift appearing.
Sudden joy to waiting hearts;
While in dread dismay the sleeper
From his dream of folly starts.

I am coming: not in weakness,
As to Bethlehem long ago;
But with angel-hosts attending,
Victory over every foe.

Saints from ancient graves shall meet me.
Living saints caught up shall be;
And the kingdom of my glory
Cover earth from sea to sea.

I am coming, but none knoweth,
Neither saint nor angel fair,
When shall be that solemn Advent,
And the day of God appear:

But the faithful shall be crowned,
And with me shall walk in white,
Through the everlasting ages,
In the world of perfect light.

. . . . . .

Darkly o'er the storm-clouds gather,
And the air is full of dread;
Sin's dark hosts around us sweeping,
Faith on earth seems almost dead.

But the bridal souls are waiting,—
Chosen, precious, sealed, secure!
Waiting for the Bridegroom's coming,
Strong in hope that maketh pure.

THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

In THE RESTITUTION for May 5th there is a long article from the pen of J. Cameron, Edinburgh, Scotland, commenting on one of mine in the number for March 10th. I am glad that attention has been called to the matter as I am persuaded that there exists among those professing a belief of the gospel of the kingdom of God a very imperfect understanding of what they really do believe upon the matter. The points in my article objected to by J. C. are 1. The translations of Matt. iii. 2. "The reign of the heavens hath come," instead of as in the C. V., "The kingdom of heaven is at hand." Matt. iv. 17 and Mark i. 15. This last quotation has the addition of the word near added to the words "hath come." These translations are not mine but simply copied from the translation of Mr. Robert Young of Edinburgh, published in 1868. All J. C.'s remarks, therefore, against the readings I have given, apply to Mr. Young and not to me.

There is a part however, that does apply to me, as the following quotation shows, and to this part and my reply thereto, I invite the special attention of those who are seeking the truth upon the matter. He says, "We fail to sustain his theory, ignores the biblical sense of this term kingdom, which is the dom of God, that is the dominion exercised by a king." Now this is just where I think that his charge against me really suits himself and justifies me from it. I here produce in full his illustration as the evidence that it is so. Where, he asks, was the exercise of Jehovah's dominion as the true king of Israel at the time when John and Jesus preached. He was truly their rightful king, but in the exercise of his divine sovereignty he suffered the authority of his kingdom to be usurped by Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, Greeks and latterly by the Romans, who made tools of the chief priests of the Jews in order to the ultimate carrying out of his own purposes. The position taken by J. C. is contrary to fact, as it was not these Gentile powers who usurped his sovereignty over Israel, but Jehovah who subjugated his rebellious subjects to these powers. His power or reign over them was as real when cast out of his sight and subjugated to chastisement as when they were in receipt of his blessings for obedience.

The case of Charles the Second of England from 1649 to 1660 given as an illustration, has no parallel. He was excluded from his dominions by his own people and could not return to them, whereas Jehovah cast out his people from his land and has not yet suffered, excepting fragments of, them to return. Nebuchadnezzar was driven among the beasts of the field until he know that the Most High ruled among the kingdoms of men and gave them to whomsoever he willed.

It was not therefore a new sovereign who came to Israel, but their own Jehovah who sent his messenger, John, that he might introduce to them the rightful heir of his throne which had been overturned in the days of Zedekiah, king of Judah. John was Jehovah's messenger, sent by him to introduce the Savior and king whom he had raised up to his people Israel. The reign of God, or the reign of the heavens, or the kingdom of God, or of the heavens which approached, came or came near or was at hand, was God's revelation concerning his king who was to fill his throne permanently. The 15th verse defines of states the substance of his preaching as follows, "And saying, The time is fulfilled and the kingdom of God is at hand or has been caused to approach. Repent ye, and believe the gospel." It is plain from this statement of Mark that the gospel preached by Jesus consisted of two things, viz., the time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand or has approached or has come. J. C. and others have assumed that the time for setting up the kingdom of God had arrived. This assumption has not the slightest ground to rest upon any more than the other held by Alexander Campbell and still adhered to by all his disciples to the present day.

Mount Etna. Its Terrific Volcanic Eruption the Most Violent Ever Known.

The volcanic eruption of Mount Etna, in Sicily, which has recently been reported as rapidly increasing in fury and in the volume of its lava, was thus described two weeks ago by a telegram to a London paper:

"Huge stones are launched into the air from the volcano to an immense height. No tilled land has yet been injured. One chestnut wood has been surrounded by streams of lava and burned. The eruption is accompanied by constant earthquakes, with terrible subterranean noises like thunder. Many dwellings have been destroyed, but happily, there has been no human victim. The sight from Catania is indescribably grand and tremendous, and vast crowds are constantly gazing at the awful spectacle. All the authorities, civil and ecclesiastical, are actively engaged in calming the minds of the people. No such eruption has been known by the oldest inhabitant."

The London Standard says:

"There is something majestic about Etna. Trees we can have elsewhere, but black, lonely wastes, like those around the crator, are only to be seen in regions harassed, as this has been, by constant eruption of burning materials and molten rock. The ashes are of a dazzling whiteness, and though in winter the snow and ice lie thick, the fire and the noxious gases seething through the porous soil are ever contending for the mastery. The view from the summit of Etna is indescribably grand. The sunrise is magnificent, and when once bathed in the Italian daylight the scene is entrancing. The mountain, with its circuit of one hundred and eighty miles, is the one prominent feature in the Sicilian landscape, and from its lofty summit ten thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven feet, a radius of one hundred and fifty miles, comprising an area larger than Ireland, can be scanned. All Sicily is spread before the eyes as if it were a map. On the south is Malta, on the north the Faro of Messina, the Neptunian Mountains and the Lipari Islands, while toward the west there is little difficulty in making out the Piano of Coslsone, and Cammarata, and the Ægadian Isles, immersed in a sea which is as blue as the great shadow of Etna is purple.

"It is hard to imagine that this volcano, 'famous, terrible, immense,' the wonder of every age, and the theme of a hundred poets and historians, has been in almost constant eruption since the earliest period at which books take notice of it. Pindar's picture of 'the rivers of fire vomited forth from its inmost caverns, and the floods of fire that gave only smoke in the daytime, but in the darkness took the form of sheets of crimson fire rolling down into the deep sea,' might stand for a graphic description of the scenes that have been witnessed many a time during the twenty-four centuries which have passed since the Theban poet composed choral songs for Hiero, of Syracuse. The 'forge of Vulcan' has always been lightsome, unless, indeed, the fact that Hor makes no mention of its volcanic character when he brings the mariner of Ulysses past it is to be accepted as any proof of the contrary. Thrice before the Christian era there were violent eruptions, and in 1169, 1329, 1537 and 1669 there have been stupendous displays of the dormant fury of Etna. On the last of these dates Monterosal burned, 27,000 persons were rendered homeless, and many lost their lives. In 1693 a combined earthquake and eruption resulted in the loss of from 60,000 to 100,000 lives, and at various intervals since there have been more or less serious outbreaks. The discharge of ashes and lava is usually preceded by an earthquake, as on the present occasion. Loud explosions were the Sicilians of what is coming. Rifts and 'boccche del fuoco' ('mouths of fire') open in the mountain side; smoke, sand, cinders and ashes follow, until they form cones in one or two places, through which last of all the boiling lava pours, and then 'Il Monte' is soon again at rest. It is well that, of the outbreaks recorded, only a very small minority have been violent, and though some have lasted for several weeks they have as a rule, been of the comparatively harmless character, which it is to be hoped the present will be. Looking at the Etna of today, the tourist who remembers his 'Strabo' can scarcely imagine that it has undergone any change since the time he wrote. The lower slopes covered with forests and fields, the vine flourishing in the fertile volcanic soil, and the upper mountain bare and sub-covered in summer and laden with snow in winter, are just as they were 2,000 years ago. The woods are as green, the charr'd, blackened, melancholy waste, crown'd by the awful peak,' is as desolate as ever, and unless the character of the volcano changes, the historian of an equally distant era will be able to take for his text Matthew Arnold's lines about "Etna's great mouth, round which the sullen vapors roll."

Have you any smart infidels in your neighborhood? Do they sneer at and ridicule your views of the Bible? If you have we have a little work here that will aid you in routing them completely, and if you have none near you now you can scarcely stir many miles without meeting one, and if you are posted in their theories you have already won half of the battle. Sister Reed's little book, "Creation vs. Evolution" is the work we refer to, and all should possess a copy. Price 25c.

Our lamented Brother Magruder's "Reply to Ingersoll" is another book that should be more largely circulated. It is just what its name indicates—a Reply to Mr. Ingersoll—a reply that Mr. Ingersoll or any other infidel will not even try to answer, so it stands, for its foundation is laid in God's holy word. Price 50c.

The Gift of Life Eternal through Jesus Christ is the great subject for us. Eternal Life a Free Gift. Brother J. H. Pettengill has written a book on this subject, and all who read it say the work is well done. We can send you a copy for $1.00.

We write and talk much of the Kingdom and its Restoration. Brother Silas Henn has written a book on this subject that will aid us very much in our study of the Kingdom and the wonders of the Restoration. One dollar will place it on your table.

There have been different ages and dispensations in the past—we live now—there is an Age to Come, and Bro. Weothee has told us in his work on this subject, the result of his life-time's search as to the nature and the proximity of the age coming hereafter. This is a large book of over 500 pages. Price $3.00.

Space will not admit of mention of half what our shelves contain. The Emphatic Diaglott, by B. Wilson; Christ's Kingdom; Where is it and What is it? by Jos. Lieslar; A Translation of Matthew's Gospel, by Chas. Gardner; that grand work, A Letter to a Friend, by Mrs. Woodruff; Which is Right? or Is Christ's Throne in Heaven or on the Earth? by Thos. Wilson; When Shall These Things Be? by H. Bowman; A Letter to a Baptist Minister, by Daniel Howard; the Doctrine of Baptism, besides a host of those little silent leaflets that work all the time. When you are resting, being wearied, they keep on. Who will help circulate these books? They are all good. There may be an isolated expression that some might object to, but the teaching in the main is endorsed by all our best writers and thinkers. We are ready to fill your orders. Or, A Scriptural View of the Second Coming of Christ, with the Wonderful Signs that will Precede it, and the still more Wonderful Things that will follow it.

—By Silas Henn.—

NOTICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS

The book is truthful, reverent and instructive, every way worthy of the attention of those who prefer calm argument to sensational speculation.—The Herald.

We are glad to express our sympathy with the general scope of the book, and to bespeak for it a wide circle of readers.—The Messenger.

The volume before us evidently the product of a thoughtful mind, and deserves the careful study of every Christian, being of a very comprehensive character, and based on Scripture. Certainly it is the best work on the subject which has come under our notice.—The Sydney Observer.

The treatment shows that the author has studied well and patiently digested his theme before writing upon it, and we feel as we read page after page, stimulated rather than clogged in our inquiry.....The aim of the volume before us is to set the truth clearly before the mind, and so restore to its place in the consciousness of the church the hope that was once so dear to God's suffering saints, and is still so to many, but which is always unwelcome to a worldly, cold and formal church, and hated by the world. This little volume will be received and read with pleasure by all who take interest in prophetic subjects.—Rev. Nathaniel West, D. D.

THE COMING AGE,

—IS—

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. Westhee.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with commensurate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar forces, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

Indeed it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Wherever read this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs All.

It contains over 350 large pages, bound in Cloth Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXV. Read PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JUNE 23, 1886. NO. 24.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR,

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief in the gospel, repentance, and immersion as a pre-requisite to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for preparation.

Selections.

THE MYSTERY OF GODLINESS. 1 Tim. iii. THE MYSTERY OF THE MARRIAGE UNION OF CHRIST AND THE CHURCH. Eph. v.

The language of St. Paul as a man not only of Jewish birth, but of Greek education, and as a great European traveller, is everywhere highly colored by reference to Greek thought and Greek speech. His many references to the "mysteries of God," to the knowledge of which only the sons of God, the twice-born, can be admitted, and that by a Divine initiation, were expressions derived from the so-called mysteries of Greek paganism. Of those the chief were those of Eleusis in Attica. The knowledge of the Eleusinian mysteries was accounted even by the wisest of the Greeks as an object of ambition. Plato himself speaks of them with great respect, inasmuch as they were believed to raise men's minds from the contemplation of the acts and histories of inferior gods to the infinite and eternal Power, and from this momentary world to a future life which should be eternal. There were similar mysteries which were revealed to purify souls in Egypt and Babylon, and probably also among the Druids of the Keltic races; so that the ancient world was familiar with the idea of the revelation of sacred secrets, unfit for the vulgar and corrupt multitude, but made known to souls purified by nine days' fasting: secrets that resulted in a special knowledge that lifted men somewhat above grovelling heathenism, and directed their thoughts to a life beyond. Nearly all the recent writers on this subject incline towards a favorable opinion of the influence of the Pagan mysteries, albeit they had no God-sent revelation to make known to men.

It was then to a Greek world, filled with an awful reverence for the mysteries, that St. Paul spoke so often of the Mystery of Godliness, of the Mystery of Iniquity, of the Mystery of the union of the Jews and Gentiles in Christ, of the Mystery of the blindness of Israel, and of the Mystery of the Resurrection at the Second Advent—mysteries "hidden for ages and generations, but now made manifest to the saints," and to them alone.

I think of offering, in this series of lectures, a few comments on the six principal mysteries referred to by St. Paul, beginning with the two related mysteries of the Incarnation, called the mystery of Godliness, and the mystery of the Marriage of the Lamb.

First of all, let us note the fact that throughout the Scriptures—both of the Old and New Testaments—the real message of God, as to his nature, his truth, and his purposes, is regarded as a mysterious science possessed only by obedient souls. "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do, seeing I know him, that he will command his household after him to keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment?" Gen. xviii. "The secret of the Lord, is with them that fear him, and he will show them his covenant." Psa. "Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of Thy law." And conversely, "Give this people eyes, that they shall not see, and make their ears heavy, that they shall not hear." "Seal up the law among my disciples." In the Old Testament the wicked masses are described as given over "to their hearts' lusts, to walk in their own counsels." In the New Testament the same law prevails. In every page there is asserted a direct action of God in blinding wicked men to truth, because of their dishonesty and wickedness, and in "revealing mysteries to the meek."

Never once do we meet with language similar to that which so commonly prevails in the modern world, such as that "every gentleman is entitled to his religious opinions" or persuasions on moral subjects; that all men have an equal right to their opinions, and an equal chance of reaching right conclusions: and that, therefore, all men must speak respectfully of each other's "religious convictions" both in doctrine and morality, and even of their professed agnosticism or ignorance, because all men are equally likely to find truth or to miss it. On the contrary, in the New Testament it is taught everywhere that men's opinions on religion, as they call them, are the results of their education, good or bad, and of their spiritual condition, for the most part corrupt and false, so that no man comes to know the truth except by a personal teaching of the Spirit of God—a renewing and illuminating change which lifts him out of the condition of the animal or natural man, who "discerneth not the things of the Spirit," into the condition of the spiritual man, who, "discerneth all things."

And so far are the Apostles from inculcating a contempt for dogma, or definite belief in Christianity, after the fashion of the modern press, that they distinctly declare that if the Apostolic Gospel be veiled, it is veiled to them that are perishing, to whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them that believe not, lest the light of the knowledge of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine into them. In the Apostolic writings, the right knowledge of God in Christ is represented as a revelation of mysteries to spiritually initiated souls; all others being left in the darkness which they have chosen, as the men of Sodom were first blinded and then destroyed. So that Divine teaching on earth is the introduction to Divine glory hereafter, while dishonest souls, "having eyes, see not, and having ears, hear not," because God will not "cast his pearls before swine." These New Testament principles strike down at a blow the boastful language of modern free thought and antichristian culture.

The inner knowledge of God is to be gained not chiefly by speculation or by book-learning, but through regeneration and illumination of the Holy Spirit. All other pretended religious knowledge is science falsely so-called. "Lead me in Thy truth, and teach me; for Thou art the God of my salvation." This is the sum and substance of applied Christianity in the New Testament. Every man is either blinded by the devil, so that God and his truth are hidden from his eyes, or he is taught and enlightened by God, in different measures, according to his teachableness, and according to his needs.

Turning next to the "great mystery of godliness," or piety, spoken of in our text by St. Paul, it is to be noted that the Revised Version has rejected the word God, and substituted for it "He who was manifested in the flesh," assigning in the margin the reason that the word "God" "rests on no sufficient ancient evidence." Let no one, however, think that the New Testament teaching on the Divine Nature of Christ, or what is called the Incarnation of the Son of God, is a fact which rests only or chiefly on a few explicit statements scattered over the pages of the Gospels and Epistles. No; it is a truth wrought into the substance of the New Testament, interwoven with all its other histories and doctrines. The rejection of it renders New Testament Christianity altogether unintelligible and incoherent. Even this text as now altered, "He who was manifested in the flesh," indicates the Incarnation with perfect distinctness. If Jesus were only a man, why should his birth be spoken of as a "manifestation in the flesh," and why should his reception up into glory be a greater mystery of godliness than the assumption of Enoch or Elijah? If Jesus were a man only, the mystery would be that he should be spoken of by St. Paul, as in ch. ii. 5, as "the Mediator between God and men, himself man, the Christ who gave himself a ransom for all,"—a mystery which would admit of no explanation.

Doubtless it is to this preceding passage of his epistle that St. Paul here refers as the mystery of godliness, the Incarnation of the Word, in order that he "might become a ransom for all." Christianity is indeed mysterious with the Incarnation at its centre; but it is incomprehensible and a mass of incredibilities, with a mere Jewish carpenter at its centre, who is, nevertheless, to be spoken of as "the Son of God and the Savior of the world." I accept Christ's own teaching, that "He came down from heaven" in order to give eternal life to dying sinners; but I can understand nothing of it, if the New Testament, with its astounding claims of Jesus to be both Judge and Savior of mankind, is to be soundly interpreted only in the light of anti-supernatural humanitarianism. So far from being a help to man's intellect in the handling of the gospel, this theory covers already a deep sea of mystery with a fog that shuts out the light from both sea and sky.

How wonderful must that "manifestation in the flesh" have been which filled men from the first with readiness to believe what Jesus and his Apostles all taught: that his human nature was but the veil of the Divinity, who dwelt in the temple of his body! Jesus has some qualities in common with other great spiritual teachers, but more which distinguish him from them all, and leave him alone as the Sun of spirits, the one visible oracle of the Infinite "Light which no man can approach unto."

What a wonderful combination of all the Divine attributes was in him! He was usually gentle as the dawn, pleasant and refreshing as the sunlight, compassionate as heaven itself to sinful dust; but what awful reserves of strength and mystery, what hidden thunderbursts of wrath against hypocrisy and the spirit of religious plunder or oppression! What unfathomable depths of wisdom, so that for two thousand years since no man finds that he has sunk a plummet to the bottom of this sea of thought and feeling in the teaching of Jesus! Above all, what evidence of Essential Life dwelling in him! so that not only did myriads of his contemporaries find it easy to believe that though he "was dead" he was "alive again;" but, ever since, men who reflect at all, in all lands, find it absolutely impossible to think him otherwise than as "alive for evermore;" and the wretched, in all the ages following, have naturally thought of him, not as a dead saint in history, but have fled to him as an ever-living Helper, Intercessor, and Friend. O Christ, hear us! O Lamb of God, who takest away the sin of the world, grant us Thy peace! So are crying to him today, in life and in death, a multitude which no man can number in every land; because men have found it practically impossible to think that such a spirit, so closely conjoined with God, can have sunk into nothingness, or could be holden by the bands of death, or share the life of perishable ephemera. There is no other teacher towards whom mankind have felt as they have felt towards Jesus. The persuasion grows with the centuries, and is extending through the world. Not only is Ethiopia stretching out her hands unto God and Christ, not only are the noble black races on the Congo inviting men, who carry their lives in their hands, to cross the seas and deserts to proclaim to them this blessed Name, but India, from the Himalayas to Ceylon, sits awe-struck and yet hopeful while foreigners preach in their bazars this Eternal Christ; and China, with her four hundred millions and her decaying faiths, welcomes in every province the evangelists of the gospel. This very month twenty fresh missionaries are leaving London to utter forth this "Mystery of Godliness" from the Wall of Tartary to the Southern Ocean.

I pray from my heart, in no contentious spirit, that our Unitarian friends in England and America, laying aside a merely verbal and depreciating criticism, may be permitted by God to enter in and see the great light of this Incarnate Love, this "Mystery of Godliness."

But I turn now to the second mystery of redemption in St. Paul's letters, the Mystery of the Marriage of the Lamb with the Church, which is his Bride.

There are few surer marks of the Divine origin of the New Testament writings than their exalted teaching on the Marriage Union. The doctrine maintained on this relation is the standard of every civilization and every religion. When the idea of family life is ennobled, all goes well with a nation. When it declines, or sinks into a rage for temporary unions, the decline of national life is at hand. When the moral ideas of a nation decline, adultery, fornication, divorce, polygamy, licentiousness, become every-day experiences. When the moral idea of marriage as a spiritual union is abandoned, and exchanged for the notion of a civil compact that can be lightly dissolved, or when marriage is treated as a partnership between equals with limited liability, the nation loses its internal cohesion, and tends towards a disintegration that can be withstood only by the iron bondage of military government. To this France is again tending. To maintain the sacredness of marriage and its binding force till death, except for the crime of adultery, has been the mainspring of modern civilization. It is rebellion against this law which brands with the scarlet letter of infamy all looser unions, and smites with the malediction of both God and man the adulterer and the harlot—Scriptural black words for two damnable personalities.

Whatever tends to render marriage impossible or difficult is so far guilty of the sins which take its place and profane its dignity. For example, since in the marriage union, one of the two must, in order to determine differences, hold the decisive authority, whosoever touches the absolute equality of the sexes in all respects discourages marriages, by training men to unmanliness and women to be unwomanly, disobedient, and insubordinate wives. The teaching of the Christ and of his Apostles is uniformly that the man is to love his wife, as Christ loved the Church, so as to render obedience possible; and the wife is to love, honor, and obey her husband, as the Church is to be "subjected to the Lord." Whatever again tends to expensive habits of living, to luxury in dwelling, in dress, in provision, in social custom and appearance, tends to the discouragement of marriage; because the large proportion of the world is poor, and is unable to support such expenditure as a corrupt civilization demands. It is clearly the purpose of God, as soon in actual fact, that men and women shall not defer marriage till they possess wealth, but shall share "plain living and thinking," and cost-joint toils, trusting to vigorous industry to promote health, and to good taste to render a modest home beautiful and cheering. Ah, yes, the chief charm of life is not in outward decoration, but in thought and affection; and the hateful laws of English fashion, which lead children to imagine that they must begin as their fathers ended, are guilty of many a blighted love-match and of many a subsequent abandoned history.

Now the picture of a blessed marriage drawn by that Prince of monks and celibates, St. Paul, in this Epistle to the Ephesians, sets before us the truth as to the Marriage of the Lamb, and his mysterious Union with the Church, who is one with him forever, in life, in love, in glory. The fairest of types and the noblest of analogies is set forth, in order to teach us the loftier reality of the Union of the King of glory with his earthly Bride.

So it is that the fossil types of inferior races foretold the coming humanity, and the animal vertebrates prophesied of the advent of man in paradise. So it is that the planet and his satellities image the vaster system of the sun and his attendant worlds. And so the earthly love is the "pattern of things in the heavens."

What, then, are the notes of analogy or resemblance between the type and the antitype—the one a figure of the other, but both of them realities in their different spheres?

I. As in paradise the woman took her beginning and received her very life—her being, with all its blessedness, and not her blessedness alone—from the man, "cast into a deep sleep," so does the Church receive her very life, her being, as well as her blessedness, from the life of Christ and from his wounded side. He was cast into the deep sleep of death; He "made an end of sins," and abolished death, and "brought life and immortality to light;" and he rises, with his Church by his side, "the Bride," "the Lamb's wife," who is one with him in the life and bliss eternal. And now her very name is Chevah, Zoe, Life. There is no matter on which Christ spoke more often on earth, as St. John records it, than that the eternal life of the redeemed Church is an outcome of the very life of the Incarnate Deity, "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." And this life of his is Divine; it is indestructible and immortal. It existed before the worlds, it is independent of all created energies, it will outlast all changes in the universe, and therefore it communicates its own everlastingness and incorruption to the redeemed. This establishes a union closer than any in visible nature, because it is of the same nature as that which unites the Father and the Son. "I in them, and Thou in Me, that they may be perfect in one." "He that is joined to the Lord is one spirit." "If any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his." "And if Christ be in you, the body is dead" (remains mortal) "because of sin, but the Spirit is life because of righteousness."

Is it not, then, shocking to think of the Church, which is the Bride of Christ, being joined to the State and "committing fornication with the kings of the earth?" This, surely, is the mark of the Babylonian harlot and of her imitation daughters. All corruptions of Christianity begin by losing sight of this vital oneness of Christ and his Church—his redeemed people. In this sense, then, Christ and the Church form One Personality. He is the head; the Church is the body. Their destiny is one, inseparable, and Divine. The origin of the Church determines both its earthly and its eternal history. It suffers with Christ now. It will be the organ, the instrument, through which Christ in glory will rule the universe under God for ever and ever. "They shall sit down with Me on My throne, even as I also overcame and sat down with the Father on his throne."

II. The Marriage of the Lamb with his bride the church carries with it her righteousness in him. The idea of a moral identification between Christ and the church in the judgment of God is the source of modern thought. But it appears in every page of the Divine Revelation, and is as ancient as the Gospel. "He hath made him, who knew no sin, to be sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him," 2 Cor. v. "He bore our sins in his own body on the tree, that we being dead unto sin might live unto righteousness: by whose stripes ye are healed." We are said to be (1) justified by grace, that is the original fountain; (2) to be justified by the blood of Christ, that is the method of salvation. The blood is the life. Christ on the cross represents sinful humanity. He bare our sins in his own body to the tree. The blood or life of that representative of sinful humanity pays forfeit to the law, and we are justified thereby (3) We are said to be justified by Faith; that is the application of the saving remedy, (4) Lastly, we are said to be justified by our works; that is the attestation to the new life in Christ. We thus receive the blessing of the primogeniture clothed in the fragrant garments of the firstborn. We are justified in him "from all things from which we could not be justified by the law." We receive pardon by believing—healing by touching him, absolution by calling on him. We are accepted in the Beloved One. The Father falls upon the prodigal's neck and kisses him, and clothes him in his own best robe, and sets all heaven rejoicing at the sinner's return. This is the Mystery of Godliness: forgiveness first, amendment afterwards; salvation by love; justification by grace; all things by free gift. "God hath commended his love to us in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." "He justifieth the ungodly." We receive the white robe of the justified, not by works of righteousness, but through his mercy which saves us, "to the praise of the glory of his grace, by which he hath made us accepted in the Beloved One."

III. The Church is one with the Lord in moral nature. Says Mr. Coventry Patmore, "Maid marrying man, remember this: You take his nature with his name." Seldom does a woman fall to be worsened if she marries ill; better if she marries nobly in the Lord. To this law the Church is no exception. Made one with Christ by renewal of life by faith, she lives by his ideas and for his ends. "He is made unto us wisdom." In him dwelleth all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. The church is no Queen of Sheba, on a flying visit, sitting at the feet of Solomon to hear his parables and to "prove him with hard questions." But she is to sit by his side through eternity, and live for ever in the blaze of his infinite intelligence. Every thought in her mind is radiant with his reflected brightness; every path of study is luming is by the beams of his wisdom as an ever-advancing pillar of fire in darkness of eternity. She is to "grow up to him in all things." Here the sciences will soon reach their limit—a limit fixed sometimes by physical conditions, sometimes by the narrow resources of sense, or of the mechanical aids to discovery. But sitting for ever in the centre of the universe, and penetrating all the domains of God by his all pervading Spirit in height and depth, Christ will explore all the depths of the Eternal mind, and teach and guide his church in the comprehension with all saints of these ever unfolding mysteries. And it will be no life of mere contemplation. He, who on earth crowded into three years' ministry activities so numerous that St. John declares their fitting record would fill the world with the books that might be written, will fill eternity with similar activities, and crowd the worlds beyond with the inexhaustible marvels of his grace and power. And the bride of the Lamb will be associated with him in those works of creation, government, and redemption. Raised in power, there will be work for every part of the body of Christ, and no one will "stand all the day idle" in the market-places of heaven. "They shall do his commandment, hearkening to the voice of his word." Endowed with the splendor of the firmament, and the speed of lightning, and the strength of the attractive forces, the vision and the flight of creatures now made equal to the angels," there will be work to do worthy of such undying energies, and a scene of later worthy of the tells of the sons of God.

IV. And now, last of all, this bride of the Lamb will be one with Christ in perfect love, "without spot or blemish." He will fix on her his loving delight for evermore. The Jesus of the Gospels is going to be our Companion, our Lord, our Lover through eternity, not losing any one of us in the innumerable company, but knowing each of us by name, and appearing to each again and again in individualizing affection for ever and ever. Oh! the hour when first our eyes behold that Blessed One! when first he enfolds us in his embrace, and gives us the kiss of peace, the zeal of his everlasting love! The Spirit and the Bride say, Come Thou! For then he will guide us by his eye and govern us by his love through eternity. Shall we not serve him for ever by love also? Shall we not serve him here and now? Lord, rend the veil even now which so much conceals Thee from our spirit. Let us now even hear Thy distant voice, "I have graven thee on the palms of My hands;" and as Thou wilt "never leave nor forsake us," so now, while we only "love Thine appearing," and "wait for Thy coming," grant that we may never deny or forsake Thee, with whom, in the bliss of this Marriage of the Lamb, we hope to live forever.—Edward White, in Rainbow.

A FALSE CHRIST IN PERSIA.

Some interesting facts relative to the rise and progress of a new sect in Persia, were related recently by Colonel C. E. Stewart of the British Army, who has spent many years in Persia. During his residence there he became so thoroughly conversant with Persian affairs, and so accurate and fluent in his use of the language that an English traveller who met him in Persia utterly failed to detect his nationality.

The "new religion" of which Colonel Stewart spoke, has for its prophet one Ali Mahomed, a native of Shiraz, who, in 1842, declared that he had been raised up by God to supersede Christianity and Islam and all the old religions of the world by a new faith. Its particular tenets were not stated, but as far as could be gathered it seemed to be a kind of reformed Islam—a faith more in accordance with the feelings and aspirations of the people than the cold form of Mohammedanism. Ali took the name of El Bab (the door), and claimed that he was the only way or door by which a knowledge of God could be obtained. His followers, of whom he soon obtained a large number, are called Babis. Subsequently he claimed that he had a new revelation, and declared that he was not merely the door, but that he was himself a divine essence sent forth from God, and he then assumed the name of the Most High.

After El Bab's preaching, the movement spread like wildfire, and in the course of six years had gathered no less than one hundred and fifty thousand followers in Persia. El Bab had chosen eighteen disciples, and these were regarded as a kind of pyramid, with himself as the apex. Nineteen was a mystical number with the Babis, who supposed it to represent the unity of God. During the interregnum in 1849, before the present Shah was established on the throne, the Babis revolted, but against the wish of El Bab, who was a man of peace, and it was nine months before the insurrection was surpassed. The leaders were killed, but they promised their followers to return to the earth in fourteen days. Needless to say they did not, and in a second insurrection the leaders thought it well to extend their own time of return to forty days.

The Government of Persia, alarmed at the spread of Babism, decided to put El Bab to death. He was accorded mock trial, and the sentence was pronounced. It may be explained that it is a common thing in Persia for a condemned prisoner to have his throat cut with a pocket knife while in court; but, to prevent El Bab's followers making capital out of [illegible] death, public execution was [illegible] on. Two disciples, who were condemned with him, were offered pardon on renouncing him. One did so, and spat in El Bab's face and secured his own release, but the other remained firm. "I'll die with my prophet, but I'll never deny him," was his reply to the repeated entreaties of his wife and child.

The story of El Bab's death, as told by Colonel Stewart, was most extraordinary. He and his follower were suspended from the citadel wall, and the soldiers fired upon them. When the smoke had cleared away the disciple was found dead, but El Bab had gone. The explanation was that the bullets had snapped the rope by which he was suspended, and he dropped into the ditch and escaped for a time, but he was soon captured and hacked to pieces by a Persian captain. The persecution was, in 1852, renewed in Teheran on an attempt being made on the Shah's life by three Babis. Forty of the new sect were put to death, among them Gourrot-ul-Ayn (the delight of the eyes), so called on account of her great beauty. These people were offered free pardon if they would only say No to the question, Are you a Babi? but they all remained firm to their faith, and were put to death with the most horrible tortures.

A successor to El Bab soon appeared on the scene, and he claimed the title El Baha, which signifies the light. This prophet, who is the present leader of the movement, had very extensive ideas of his mission, and set himself to work to reach the great monarchs of the world. Among others he wrote to Queen Victoria, whom he commended for the abolition of slavery, and for resigning her Government into the hands of her Parliament, which, he said, were wise steps. He was, however, concerned about her spiritual condition, and exhorted her to the Lord.

The followers of El Bab and his successor, El Baha, are very numerous in Persia, and they are making many converts. That they are sincere is evident from the fact that they are always ready to die for their faith, which cannot always be said for Christians. The appearance of these teachers is another fulfillment of prophecy, Matt. xxiv. 24.—Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman.

SOLOMON'S POOLS AND GARDENS.

"I made me gardens and orchards, and I planted trees in them of all kinds of fruits. I made me pools of water, to water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees. Eccl. ii. 5, 6. A garden inclosed is my sister, my house; a spring shut up, a fountain sealed. Thy plants are an orchard of pomgranates, with pleasant fruits; camphire with spikenard; spikenard and saffron; calamus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense, myrrh and aloes, with all the chief spices. A fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon." Cant. iv. 12–15.

Josephus thus speaks of some pleasure grounds that Solomon had at a distance from Jerusalem: "There was a certain place about fifty furlongs from Jerusalem which is called Etham; very pleasant it is in fine gardens, and abounds in rivulets of water; thither did he use to go out in the morning sitting high in his chariot." Ant. B. [illegible] Ch. 7. Sec. 3. At this place were [illegible]'s pools, which remain to the [illegible] in a state of good preser[illegible] there were three [illegible] or [illegible] on terraces one below another so that the lower pools catch the overflow from those above.

Secret fountains fed these pools, and a tunnel connected with secret conduits conveyed the fresh cool waters into the city. The whole system was a most wonderful piece of workmanship. To these sealed fountains an allusion is conveyed in one of the above cited passages from Canticles. It was here that he had a summer palace to which he drove over one of the roads leading out of Jerusalem paved with black stone which was most probably quarried beyond Jordan. In the Septuagint the word rendered orchard above is παραδείσος, paradise, typical of the future paradise of God. Rev. ii. 7.

From an exchange—Messiah's Herald—we reprint the following which will, no doubt, interest all looking for the future restoration of Israel and Israel's land.

SOLOMON'S GARDENS FOR SALE.

A correspondent of the Age to Come Herald (S. Kanstorcorn) writes, that the once famous gardens of king Solomon are now offered for sale for four months—if not sooner sold—for the sum of $5,150. The owner is a wealthy merchant in Jerusalem, who does not want the care of them. His sons are in Europe where they are to remain, and he has just decided to sell. "These gardens," says the writer, "are situated in Urtos, one-half hour's ride from Bethlehem, and near the new road to Hebron. The place is supposed to have been a country residence of Solomon; which judging from the beauty of the place and the fruitfulness of the gardens, is not improbable. There are seven of them, containing about twenty acres of land, which are enclosed with good stone walls and covered with the choicest fruits of the world. There are two good houses, one of them containing two rooms and two magazines; and the other has three rooms, built by the present owner. There is a fine spring of water, the source of which is unknown. It is mentioned in the Song of Solomon, chap. iv. 12. The fruits and vegetables from these gardens always command the highest price in the market. The place has been rented to an agent for several years who pays to the owner annually sixty-five Turkish pounds and then leases to a sub-agent. A German who has been engaged in the cultivation of honey, has been living in this place for some time and his honey is the finest in the market. There is a chance for bee culture, and a dairy; and good markets. The new road now being built to Hebron will raise the price of the gardens to double their present value in a little while. Dr. Robinson believed that the village of Urtos was the veritable Etam which Josephus informs us was one of the favorite morning drives of king Solomon. There are traces of very ancient ruins in the valley. I believe a good American hotel built here would be well patronized, as many go there now for the pure air and water. Most certainly Solomon would have chosen the healthiest and nicest locations for his country residences."

Selections.

"HADES."

If any apology be needed for the subject of the present short address it must be made on account of its interest. I am aware that it is a moot point with the Association, but of all the questions which revolve around the central one of life alone in Christ, the doctrine of the intermediate state stands perhaps the first, and for this reason: there is no question upon which men's minds have diverged so much, or which has moved men's hearts like that of death. "It keeps the keys of all the creeds." It takes away our acquaintances, it robs us of our friendships.

"Never morning wore
To evening, but some heart did break."

No wonder then that such burning questions as "what is death?" "and why is it?" have occupied the attention of both the ignorant and the philosopher alike. Men will, generally, do anything to get rid of the thought, but like the pendulum of a clock which crosses and recrosses the centre of gravity, men's minds strike away, but ever and anon are brought back to the point of attraction. Yet in vain have the ignorant thought and philosophers studied. Death "is the bourn from which no traveller returns," and though there have been some few exceptions where, by God's power, the dead have been brought from death, yet these have made the mystery still more mysterious, for they told nothing.—Had they anything to tell?

It is this vagueness, this helplessness (apart from revelation I mean), to discover anything concerning the state of the dead, that has led men to guess, invent, and finally try to persuade themselves into certain beliefs; and when a revelation is made that throws any light at all upon the subject, such are the vain traditions of men, that what we read is so altered, touched up and colored that an angel of light even could scarce tell whence came the information.

Seeing then that such a doctrine is so woven round the hearts of men, it is the merest folly to ignore it, and a feeble effort is here made to lay before you, as far as time permits, that which appears to be the truth.

I would speak with modesty and without dogmatizing, yet would I speak with no uncertain sound.

Hades, or the Unseen, has been described in every possible state of existence, from that of slumber up to that state where man has more power of thought, a greater expansion of action than he had during life; where, in fact, the state of being is as much above what it was at first as the heavens are above the earth.

To give a little more detail: one class views it as a falling asleep, the sleep of death.

Another looks at it from a classical point of view, so elaborated by the Greeks and other nations of old, that hades is a vast region, dimly lighted, and peopled with solemn, almost silent shades, who wander to and fro, "seeking rest and finding none," shadows possessing not the slightest substance, mere airy nothings.

Then another takes it to be a purgatory where sinners are cleansed by fire to prepare them for the blessed abodes of angels and of God.

Another class makes the intermediate state into a preparatory school for the higher joys of heaven. "To the saints who died in the faith it is a school of rest, comfort, leisure, and enlightenment. To such as never heard the name that is above every name, it is a school in which they shall hear it, and many shall bow in willing homage, and confess him Lord to the glory of God the Father."

And again, one goes still further, and in a very promiscuous and unsatisfactory manner, does away with all this, sending saints straight to heaven, though David be not ascended there, and forming choirs of children, singing around the throne of God, yet leaving their poor, lisping, stammering tongues somewhere else.

Let us take one revelation, not troubled by fear, nor biased by preconceptions, but led in honest doubt if you will. When we take the work of some great author we find that he has some drift, some plot, some lesson "to point a moral or adorn a tale." So (if I compare greater things with smaller), with the revelation of God. It shows us "of man's first disobedience and the fruit of that forbidden tree....with loss of Eden, till one greater man restore us;" it shows us of man's forfeiting an earthly paradise, but brought by Christ to the Paradise of God; it shows us man returning unto his dust, but redeemed from the grave at Christ's great cost; it shows us of death, life,—death, life,—ever ringing in alternate tones from the beginning to the end of God's revelation.

"Death reigned from Adam to Moses," even where no law was, it reigned while under a state of law, it reigns while under a state of grace, it will ever reign till "Death be swallowed up in victory."

And, further, when we are emphatically told that hades is "a land of darkness," and "forgetfulness," that "the dead go down into silence," that "the dead know not anything," that "men's very thoughts perish," that "the night cometh when no man can work," it seems to me impossible that such language can mean anything else but what is apparent on the surface.

True it is that passages may be quoted showing apparently that dead ones may be alive, and I do not for one moment wish to evade them, but they are no more than two or three at most in number, and even then there is an amount of difficulty, and such diversity of opinion, that they cannot in my humble opinion be set against the whole tenor and bearing of Scripture, and those more direct and emphatic utterances. The idea of death being a sleep, a state of unconsciousness, can only be pushed aside on the strength of those two or three passages. Take the idea of purgatory for instance. No doubt its main support is the parable of the rich man and LAZARUS. Yet even this is dead against the doctrine, for if one lesson be taught there, it is, that for the dead there is no opportunity, for "if they hear not Moses and the prophets" how also are they to be persuaded.

As for hades being a school where scholars may learn, will not eternity be long enough?

And as for the heathen and impenitent—I can concede to any man that it may be God's purpose to give the heathen who have never heard of him just as it was his purpose to redeem Adam and the race, but Adam, as far as I can find, knew nothing of that; no more, as far as I can find, does God inform us of his purposes toward the heathen. It thus becomes a region of speculation which avails nothing. I feel inclined to leave the matter in God's hands. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?"

As for the language used by Christ concerning the greater toleration towards Sodom and Gomorrah, and Tyre and Sidon, than to such cities as Chorazin and Bethsaida, that seems to me comprehensible. The few stripes or the many will be given according to desert. To go further is to follow, I think, an ignis fatuus—and I cannot follow. We find ourselves in mist and bog, and like the traveller, who when up to his horses girths, was told that below there was good, solid bottom, only that as yet he was but half-way there, there may be standing ground for those speculations, but we get overwhelmed and lost before reaching it. To "save a soul from death" is more to me than any guesses as to whether the heathen will, in the intermediate state, have the gospel preached to them, or the impenitent have another chance.

You say "this is a gloomy doctrine." So it is. I cannot see that it can be otherwise so long as death is the wages of sin. But is this all? Thank God, no. Though death is not "the Prince of peace," though death is not "the gate of life," though death is presented nowhere as a thing to cheer the heart, it need not trouble us. The minds of God's beloved should be always directed to the resurrection. There gives the triumph. We know that the grave is the mark of sin and the power of Satan. It may be the burial of all our hopes, but we are to look beyond this gloom and darkness, waiting for the coming of him we love, when we shall be ever with the Lord. This was Paul's hope, Paul's longing. Life was troublesome and death was a punishment. What he wanted was the appearing of his Lord, when "God shall wipe all tears from all eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things have passed away."

It is unconsciousness for a moment or, and then an eternity of heaven.

There are just two points which seem to require a word.

Hades is spoken of as having great depth and profundity. Well, what is deeper than the unseen? When a beloved one departs from our midst, can we draw aside the bolts and bars of the grave and deliver him? Can we search and bring him back? And yet the knowledge of God is deeper, and so we cry with Jonah:

"The waters compassed me about even to the soul; the deep was round about me: the weeds were wrapped about my head. I went down to the bottoms of the mountains; the earth with her bars closed upon me for ever: yet hast thou brought up my life from the pit, O Lord my God."

Finally, you may ask me, "What about the preservation of identity, if the dead be unconscious, and apparently lost and forgotten?"

I reply, "God has not informed us, I do not know." One thing I know—

I know that "it is not a thing incredible that God should raise the dead."

I know that though "the dead be sown in corruption, they will be raised in incorruption."

I know that then will go up the shout, "O death, where is thy sting, O grave, where is thy victory?"

"I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand in the latter days upon the earth," and I know that then "when I awake in his likeness I shall be satisfied."

This is enough for me. Is it sufficient for you?—Alfred M. King, in Bible Standard.

What the Jewish Papers are Saying.

The Jews of Balkh, Central Asia, which may some day be the trysting-place within which the perennial rivality between Russia and England will be fought out, contains a not inconsiderable population. Where they came from, or how they got there, are questions that have been extensively inquired into by both Jews and Gentile savants. In a recent issue of the Mayence Israelit we find an interesting contribution towards the solution of these questions in the shape of an account of the Jews of Balkh on the Amon river. The following is an abstract of this account:—

"Small, poor, and utterly neglected is the 'Kehilath Beni Yakob,' i. e., the Congregation of the Sons of Jacob, which exist at Balkh. But on the other hand it is old, very old, since it is stated to have been in existence not for centuries, but for several thousand years. The oldest Persian chronicles of Balkh—the first of those written by Ibn Gaswein, dates from the second of the Mahometan era, that is to say, from the seventh century of the Christian chronology—sets forth that the Assyrian king, Bal-Assar, the Tiglath-pileser of Scripture, in order to protect his dominions against the incursions of the nomad tribes that resided on the other bank of the river Amon-Darya, built a large fortified city and called it Baleeha, which in ancient Persian and Assyriac means a protection or a bulwark. Other Persian chronicles derive the name of the city from that of the Assyrian goddess Baleeha. In order to populate the new town, the king ordered hundreds of the children of Israel to settle in the south of the city.

"When El Karnagen, 'the great horn' of Daniel vii. 21, that is to say Alexander the Great, in the course of his expedition to India, visited the city of Balkh, the Jews received him with great rejoicings and offered him ships to cross the river, so as to enable him to subjugate the Nomadic tribes living on the other side of the Amon. A tradition still prevalent among the Jews of Balkh has it that during the period of the Second Temple, envoys were sent by them to Jerusalem, who were to offer prayer and sacrifices on behalf of their brethren in exile. The story seems incredible, and there is not a title of evidence to be found in any Jewish or Gentile author of antiquity, to prove its accuracy. The only fact bearing thereon is that one of the streets is called Mochalets El-Kuds, which means the road to Jerusalem.

"The invasion of the Arabs, which took place after the death Mahomet, worked a great change in the situation of the Jews of Balkh. The Emir Walid, who commanded them, penetrated through Herat and Cabul into India, and it was he who imposed a capitation tax, called charag eleyenud, upon the Jews of the last-named cities as well as those of Balkh. This tax the Jews are still subject to. At that time, they mustered about 12,000 strong, and possessed eighteen synagogues. But with the Persian rule over Afghanistan, hard times began for the Jews. The Persian governors oppressed and persecuted them. Most of them left Balkh and sought on the other side of the Amon Darya that peace and quiet which they could not find in their old homestead.

"At the present day there are scarcely more than 500 Jews left in Balkh. They still inhabit the part of the town that was assigned to them by Tiglath-pileser. The language they use is Persian mixed with Hebrew, Chaldee, and Assyrian words. In this language sermons are also delivered in their synagogue. Jews from Persia find it difficult to make themselves understood to those of Balkh. All the religious wants of the Jews of Balkh are supplied from Bokhara, which is a kind of metropolitan city for all the Jewish congregations of Central Asia. In every town of Turkestan in which there are any Jews, the Beth Hamidrash, or infant school, is used at night as a place for Jewish travellers to rest in. This is so well known that any Jewish stranger arriving in a place at once betakes himself to the Beth Hamidrash, and as soon as his arrival becomes known, the heads of the Jewish households proceed at once to meet him and have their supplies brought there. They all sit down together on a large carpet, and the stranger is asked to partake of the supper of each member of the congregation in rotation. When the repast is over he has to state the object of his visit, and to tell them the latest news of the place he came from. If he is a man of great piety and learning, those present ask him his blessing, and also send for their wives and children to be blessed by him. The next day, on the morning of his departure, the congregation send him a lamb and a sack of flour, also some honey and dates, out of which the wife is to prepare the viaticum (Zoodah lederech) for the stranger. Oftentimes the members of the congregation draw lots who is to attend the stranger to the next place in which there are Jews, and in this way Turkistan becomes a very safe country for Jews, though not for Gentiles, to travel in."

The Jews of Bokhara. From an account of the Jews of Bokhara which we find in the Israelit, it would appear that the congregation of that place is nothing like so old as that of Balkh. From the Persian chronicles it is to be inferred that a Jewish congregation existed at Bokhara some 200 years prior to the birth of Mahomet, that is to say, somewhat about the end of the fourth century of the Xnera. The Jews of Central Asia look upon Bokhara as their spiritual metropolis. At the head of their congregation a man placed who enjoys the title nahara de-golwatu, that is to say, "The Light of the Exile," and the congregation itself is called Kehilan Kadosha, that is to say, the Holy Congregation. But it is not only holy, but numerous and wealthy. It musters 8,000 strong. The silk trade and the silk manufactories of Bokhara, which enjoy a great reputation all over the world, are entirely in the hands of the Jews. One third of these support themselves on the making of silk fabrics, one-third on trade, and the rest are rabbis, physicians, teachers and citizens.

The Jews of Bokhara enjoy a kind of self-government such as they are not granted in any other part of the world. They have a court of law of their own, called beth din, which sits every Sunday, Monday, and Thursday, and from whose findings no appeal lies to anyone except the Emir himself. It hardly ever happens that its rulings are reversed by the Emir. Short of capital punishment, the beth din is authorized to pronounce and enforce every kind of sentence, that is to say, both fines and imprisonment. The language of the Jews of Bokharia is Turkish; the better education speaks Persian, and of late years they have also commenced to cultivate Russian. The religious rites of the Jews of Bokhara so closely resemble those of the Jews of Europe that they are generally supposed to be the descendants of the Israelites who formed the kingdom of Judah.—Prophetic News, and Israel's Watchman.

Russia Threatens War.

The Emperor of Russia last month signalized his visit to the Crimea, not only by the launching of ironclads, opening docks, and laying the foundation of barracks, but by issuing a manifesto, which, whatever its real purpose, has already sent a flutter through the Capitals and Exchanges of Europe. The Vienna Bourse was unfavorably affected, and a heavy fall in stocks took place. Just when the world was not looking for any new and formidable menace of war, the Czar addresses his people in a tone charged with threats to European peace. It is no common occasion that has taken the Emperor to the Crimea. He is accompanied by the Empress, the Grand Duke Alexis, the Grand Duke Michael, and the Lord High Admiral of Russia. The posts of honor in the assemblage have been given to the most eminent survivors among the officers of high rank who participated in the defence of Sebastopol thirty years ago. Admirals on crutches, and weighed down with years, have been brought from St Petersburg, and from one extremity of the Empire to the other, in order that the ceremonies of the hour might lack nothing in impressiveness and significance. The launch of the Tchesma ironclad appears to have been an imposing spectacle, and a sister ironclad called Sinope, is being rapidly pushed to completion. Sebastopol after the Crimean war was dismantled, and has remained a heap of rubbish till lately. But new barracks are being rebuilt, docks are already in good working order; and a Black Sea fleet is being prepared. Russia is supposed to be preparing to invade Bulgaria and Roumelia. Greece may then be found to be on the side of Russia.

The Czar's Manifesto above mentioned is as follows: "Thirty years have elapsed since the Black Sea Fleet heroically sacrificed itself for the whole of Russia. That fleet is now born again, to the great joy of our Fatherland, which has been so long in mourning for it. My will, my every thought, have ever been directed to promote the pacific development of the welfare of the Russian people, but circumstances may prevent the realisation of my wishes, and compel me to defend by force of arms the dignity of the Empire. You will with me uphold it with devotion, and you will show the same firmness of which your fathers gave proof, in response to my grandsire's appeal, in a manner which wrung admiration from all their contemporaries. I call upon you in your turn to watch over these waters, which have witnessed in past time Russian heroism, and to your care I confidently commit the honor and security of Russia."

Editor Restitution:

Enclosed you will please find two dollars fo. my subscription with many thanks for your kind patience. In your communication of Nov. 10 you refer to the trying position of an editor, which trial grows out of the fact that his readers share the common tendency of man, namely, a consciousness that their conclusions have been honestly sought and legitimately arrived at and are therefore to be held on to tenaciously. The fact that we are children in our Father's school seems to be overlooked, and that our Father treats us as children with children's capacities only, and therefore does not present us with truth in the concrete, but in detail only, and only such phases of it as we can comprehend at any one time. For instance, we must learn the alphabet before we can put its letters together to make words, before we can put them into intelligent sentences, and so step by step we must learn the art of using the language correctly. To expect a child before it has been educated to use language correctly would be to expect what would amount to a miracle.

Again, to expect a child who has never been away from home or seen anything in the world but what exists and occurs in the limits of its own surroundings, to converse with you intelligently on things outside of its plane, or to comprehend the terms and phrases of scientists as they use them in relation to common things, would be expecting an impossibility.

All knowledge is acquired step by step, slowly, and it frequently happens that we acquire knowledge that we have no use for, and no means of applying for long periods after it has been acquired. But when the occasion comes, we remember what we learned long time ago, and under circumstances perhaps of an impressive character. Just as we teach children at school many branches of knowledge that they have no immediate use for, and cannot appreciate till the occasion for its use occurs, then the wisdom of our action is manifest to them.

If all the disciples of our blessed Lord would constantly bear in mind that they are only disciples, scholars, and must remain so as long as they continue in the flesh, and that therefore their business is to be ever learning, that they cannot crystalize and stereotype what they have acquired at any particular point in their progress, and insist that the things they have acquired constitute the sum and substance of their Father's teaching and must be accepted by all, and nothing further can be acquired. No! No! We cannot change our characters as scholars, till we are born as children into the kingdom at the resurrection.

Let me say to the brethren then: Be not dogmatic and overbearing, you have yet to learn something or our Father would not continue you at school. He never performs works of supererogation. Your brother who differs from you may have acquired some truth that you have not. If you are perfectly rooted and grounded on the truth you need not fear to examine arguments from any source that claim to advocate truth. Our Savior said, "You shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." Again, you shall be sanctified by the truth. "Sanctify them by thy truth; thy word is truth." Beside, the office of the Comforter during the absence of our blessed Lord is to "guide his disciples into all truth." Thus "every one that is of the truth heareth my voice," saith the Lord. "For my sheep hear my voice and follow me; a stranger they will not follow." But they "who receive not the truth in the love of the truth are condemned." I say again the children of the truth cannot be injured by giving patient inquiry and examination into whatever claims to be truth. Do not reject it if teaching comes from those who follow not with you. You have an infallible guide and may patiently listen without fear to every one who professes to advocate truth. Our Lord, our Elder Brother, was liberal, open, frank; we must be like him if we have drank into his spirit and therefore we cannot forbid any one because they follow not with us. We look to our matured scholars to grapple with every difficult problem. If they ignore them, they confess they are unequal to the task and we drop them as master teachers. If we ignore or refuse to consider questions raised concerning revealed truth, do we not thereby confess ourselves very immature scholars? Faithfully yours,

G. B. STACY.

Conference Report.

The Third Quarterly Conference of the Church of God in Indiana, met as per announcement at Antioch, on Friday, June 11, 1886. A good number of the brethren and sisters from different sections were present, and a profitable gathering together it truly was. The preaching was mainly by Brethren Woodward, Daiggins and Wince. Rain prevented many from attending on Sunday, however good attentive congregations listened to the teaching at each session.

No business of any importance was transacted. The next conference will probably be held at Argos, early in September—definite time and place will be announced in due season.

NOTHING TO FEAR.

Our waiting souls have naught to fear
Though dark the way before us;
The loving Christ is always near
And tender watch keeps o'er us,

"The loving Christ!" oh man forget
What wondrous love he gave us;
A matchless life, so pure, and yet
He suffered sin* to save us.

He knows the heart, thrice blessed thought
No mortal judge can move us;
In pathways drear, with sadness fraught,
Christ ever true doth love us.

WHAT THINK YE OF THE CHRIST? WHOSE SON IS HE?--Matt. xxii. 42.--No. 2.

The sentence passed upon the woman, who had sinned by being deceived, was in relation, so far as womankind is individually concerned, to the conditions pertaining to the reproduction of the species. Reproduction and its troubles were increased; her desire towards her husband, her dependence, was also increased, while his power of domination was curtailed from dominion over all the organic life-forms of the earth, to ruling her. See Gen. iii. 16; 1 Cor. ii. 3: Eph. v. 22–24; 2 Peter iii. 1.

The prevailing thought of the woman's sentence, and of the other testimonies concerning her, is, that the woman, subject to deception, was placed under the restraining influence, or control of the husband for her protection against the beguiling allurements of evil, while her sorrow and conception were increased.

She was, of course, subject to the penalty of death, because she was of the earth, earthy; and, having transgressed a positive law of God, the result of which is always death, she became obnoxious to the final result, through her relation to Adam, the presumptuous transgressor.

Yielding, as she did, under temptation, to the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes and the pride of life, these wrought their legitimate result in the multiplication of sorrow and conception.

Woman was in the transgression, yet under the extenuating conditions of deception; and it was to these conditions, possibly, that the human race was indebted for a prolonged existence after the fall, instead of being immediately stricken from the stage of action, as man himself so richly deserved; and it was under these conditions that the Virgin Mary was approached by the angel in the annunciation, i. e., as the only part of the human race in which were any redeeming features for human kind.

In approaching the paternity of Christ we find ourselves on delicate ground, over which no one should pass save with reverence and godly fear. Careless unthoughtedness and impious haste, or surrility, have no business within these sacred precincts, where only truth, honesty and sobriety may feel worthily at home.

That Joseph, the husband of Mary, was not the father of the Christ, is not only attested by Matthew (chap. i.) and Luke (chap. i.), but may be inferred also from the fact alone, that had Joseph been his father, the Christ would not have differed from all his predecessors and contemporaries, and would, therefore, have been unsuited to fulfil the prophecies and promises concerning the Christ, or act as a surety for the human race. But what saith the Scriptures? John says, "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God and the word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him and without him was not anything made that was made. In him was life; and the life was the light of men..... That was the true Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world. He was in the world and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not.....And the word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father,) full of grace and truth." John i. 1–14. (One of the appellations of the Christ, it will be recollected, is "the word of God," and is applied to him when John beheld him riding forth upon a white horse to smite the nations. Rev. xix. 13.

Before passing further let us pause and note some of the works accomplished by the word. "By the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water: whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished; but the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." 2 Peter iii. 5–8. "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth.....For he spake and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast." Psa. xxxiii. 6, 9. "Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear." Hebrews xi. 3. "Thus saith God the Lord, he that created the heavens and stretched them out; he that spread forth the earth and that which cometh out of it." Isa. xlii. 5.

"God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed anything, seeing he giveth to all life and breath, and all things; and hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation." Acts xvii. 22. "These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true witness, the beginning of the creation of God." Rev. iii. 14. "Every good and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first fruits of his creatures." James i. 17, 18. "The seed is the word of God." Luke viii. 11. "See that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently; being born (begotten) again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever." 1 Peter i. 22, 23.

God works through agencies and intelligences to accomplish all his works of creation, goodness, mercy and loving-kindness, hence, (as in previous times when announcing his purpose to the earth-dwellers,) at the annunciation, the angel Gabriel, said to Mary, "Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found favor with God. And behold thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a Son, and shalt call his name Jesus." And to Mary's wondering inquiry, "How shall this be, seeing I know not a man?" he answered, "The Holy Spirit shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." Luke i. 30–35. "Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: when as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost (Spirit). Then Joseph her husband, being a just man, and not willing to make her a public example, was minded to put her away privily. But while he thought on these things, behold the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a dream, saying, Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife; for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Spirit." Matt. i. 18.

What shall we deduce from the foregoing quotations in relation to the parentage of the Christ? That God by the word (his word) through the agency of the angelic messengers, wrought the creation of the heavens and the earth as they were of old. That he, by the same word, and through the same agency, created all the organic forms which have existed from the beginning of creation. That, by the same word, Adam was made a living soul: of the earth, earthy; as were all the predominating animal creations of the age in which he lived. That the same word "was made flesh and dwelt among us," a type of the preponderating class of animal forms in "the ages to come," in the person of the Christ. That the same "word of God is the seed," which develops Christian faith and character in those who, during the gospel dispensation, "are made partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust. That the same word of God which created Adam and "hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth," acting on the unimpregnated ovum within the womb of the Virgin Mary, developed a new creature; in the form of God; ("the express image of the Father's person; Heb. i. 3) made in the likeness of man, a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, even the death of the cross. He partook of the human nature, and took on himself the seed of Abraham, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their life-time subject to bondage.

He is the firstborn of every creature, the beginning of the creation of God, who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works; a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, "called out of darkness into his marvelous light; which in time past were not a people, but now are the people of God."

With Mary of Galilee, a lineal descendant from Eve by Adam, as his mother, and the quickening, energising, fructifying, purifying, world creating word of God as the vitalising principle, the Christ, thus begotten, as the progenitor of another race, as the second or "last Adam," in the form of man, and subject to the same trials by temptation as the rest of humanity, yet without sin, is both "the Son of man," (by his mother,) and "the Son of God," through having been begotten directly by the word of God.

He was made under the law; yet he was not obnoxious to its curse, because when tempted he was without sin. Indeed his birthright was entirely from under the curse, as has been shown by his parentage, hence he was free to offer himself as a ransom for those who were under the curse. "For," says Paul, "he (God) hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him;" and again, "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." Gal. iii. 13. As the Son of man and by his descent through Abraham and David, on his mother's side, he at once inherited the throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel, as king of the Jews, and all the promises made both to David, as to his succession, and to Abraham, as the father of the faithful, while, as the Son of God, his "kingdom is not of this world, or, of the present order of things, but of the world to come; as it is written, "Unto the angels hath he not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak." Heb. ii. 5. "But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor; that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man. For it became him, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through suffering." Heb. ii. 9, 10.

BABYLON.

In an article in a recent number of THE RESTITUTION I observed a remark to the effect that the very site of "ancient" Babylon is unknown. I am quite at a loss to understand how the brother who wrote the article referred to could have derived his information on this point. I have carefully made inquiry in the leading encyclopedias and in the works of travellers and writers on that locality, and have, up to now, not found a single authority who has arrived at such a conclusion, although I have hunted in one of the best libraries in the United States.

It may seem a trivial matter to some brethren as to where "old" Babylon was. The subject is usually treated as a very light matter indeed, and any one who even ventures to investigate it is liable to be treated to the smile of pity that is bestowed upon the weak-minded. However I am one of those who do not mind these trifles occasionally, and with the consent of our beloved Editor I will lay before the brethren the facts in this case; as to the things that stand or fall on the issue I will not at present concern myself except to say that the present condition of the town is in exact accordance with the words of prophecy.

The name of Babel or Babylon is derived from the two words bab, the gate, and El or Ilon, God, and signifies "the gate of God." The supposition that it means "confusion" is false for two reasons: 1st, the word confusion in Hebrew is balal (see R. V.) and not babel, and 2nd, Hebrew was not the language of Shinar. This signification of the name is definitely proven from the fact that in the deciphered languages of Babylonia although the name differs entirely in sound, it is the same in sense. This name was given to it, we are told in Genesis, from the fact that God there entered in and scattered the nations confusing their language, etc. From that time on it has in some sort of manner ever existed, even to the present. Isaiah tells us that the "Assyrian founded it for them that dwell in the wilderness," and they there erected the first universal empire, which also carried away the children of Israel into captivity. Later it was rebuilt by Nebuchadnezzar and beautified to the utmost under the dynasty known as the Babylonian, which ended in the reign of Belshazzar. From that time it was the center and seat of the successive empires of Media, Persia and Greece. From the death of Alexander the Great, who there established the last of the empires of Babylon, it fell into decay and "widowhood," as it were, but still existed as a town of some importance, and it is at present, as I will show by quotations from authorities on the matter, somewhat of a place although under a different name.*

The errors that have arisen concerning the site of Babylon being lost were caused by the great ignorance of the geography of this section of the world obtained in former times, and the change of names that has occurred, as well as certain views concerning the prophecies that only could be had when the original Babylon is "found no more at all." Suffice it to say that the truth of God is not to be upset by any "modern discoveries." The site of Babylon is established beyond a doubt. The bricks stamped with Nebuchadnezzar's name have been found; innumerable records of business transactions have been interpreted, and many other evidences have been produced which only the wilfully blind will refuse to see.

I will now make a few quotations to show the present condition of the town, only adding that a lithograph view of the river, bridge and fortification can be seen in Col. Porter's book, from "Babylon and Chaldea," a French work.

"The modern town which stands today on the ruins of Babylon, Hillah, was founded by Leifeddaulat about the year 1100 after Christ. Hillah, according to M. Oupert, was a quarter of Babylon, probably that occupied by the working population outside the enclosure of the royal palace. Numerous traces of ancient buildings augment this origin of the modern town. There is not in Hillah a house which is not built with the bricks of Babylon. The debris of the great city has, for that part, been considered from time immemorial, as the quarry, and even now there are around the ruins, brick diggings (sakkar) whose business is to extract materials from the ancient edifices for the construction of new."

From P. V. N. Myers, in "Remains of Lost Empires." "We passed our last night upon the site of Babylon in camp beneath a beautiful date grove. We allude to this circumstance because the fact of there being palm groves, gardens, Arab villages and encampments within the limits of the ancient city, has been triumphantly pushed forward by those who have desired to cast reflections upon the truthfulness of prophecy, and to others has been the occasion of honest doubt, implying an unexplained discrepancy between prophecy and fact. The camp alluded to above was Colonel Herbert's, the English resident at Bagdad, who, with a number of friends and a large train of attendants, had come to the 'gardens of Hillah' for a short respite from duty. The Colonel very courteously made us the guest of his tent. Almost his first words after a mutual interchange of greetings, were, 'I fail to discover the desolation of desolations here; why, this morning I sketched a view from this spot looking down the river, and it is one of the richest pictures I ever saw; and here I am encamped on the old site in a beautiful date grove.' It is true that the Euphrates leads a beautiful belt of verdure across the ancient site. Both above and below the village of Hillah, which is an Arab town of from ten to twelve thousand inhabitants, situated about five miles below the group of ruins which have been designated as the 'Royal Quarter.' The Euphrates is lined with patches of cultivation or date groves known as the 'Gardens of Hillah.' The vistas of the palm fringed river are indeed beautiful.... they seem to convey some conception of what must have been the beauty of the Babylonian capital.....Notwithstanding the general desolation of the site we were at first somewhat perplexed upon observing the beautiful groves and Arab villages, and tents beneath the trees, for we had in mind the prophecy, 'no man shall dwell there,' 'the Arabian shall not pitch his tent there,' and our conversation with Col. Herbert tended to deepen our perplexity."

Description of Hillah from Fullerton's Gazetteer of the World: "The town (Hillah) is well built, has an extensive and well regulated bazaar, several stately caravanseries, chiefly built of material obtained from the ruins in the vicinity, and a number of coffee houses along the banks of the river. It is governed by a hakim under the Pasha of Bagdad. A quarter of the town situated on the east bank of the river is connected with the other by a bridge of boats, but is not nearly so considerable as the west quarter. The soil in the vicinity is fertile but almost quite neglected. A tolerably active commerce is carried on by means of sharp, well built, native vessels of from 50 to 80 tons, and drawing from 5 to 9 feet of water."

From these sources and from many others it will be found that the present remains of Babylon are a small but busy town, both in regard to commerce and manufactures, the principal articles of which are silks, leather and dyed stuffs. Steamboats ply up and down the river and caravans of camels cross and recross the bridge, which has a "draw" in the middle. Many Jews are engaged in business there, so much so that one writer suggests that it is the Jewish settlement of the "great city" that has remained since the captivity.

Concerning the "Great River Euphrates" upon which the town is situated, I rejoice to see that the truth has at last dawned upon the minds of some of the brethren and they have almost concluded that the word of God means what it says, and speaks in the language of the people for the people to understand. We have indeed suffered long enough from the subterfuges of "commentators" who have imposed deep, dark and enigmatical constructions on words and names that every school boy is familiar with the meaning of. Chambers says, "It has often been found in philosophy that the prime difficulty lay in bringing down the mind to sufficiently simple conceptions. The many soar and mystify and come to nothing; to few it is given to find truth where it usually lies amongst the things most familiar."

J. F. GELLETLY.

*I am not at all satisfied that the name of the Babylon, "God's gate," is not embodied in the present name Hillah; one thing is certain, that the sound of Allah, the Arab name of God, is there, but the signification of the application is the prefix I am ignorant of.

CHAP. XIX.

1. And Job taking up the discourse saith:
2. How long will ye weary out my life and purify me with words?
3. All ye know that the Lord hath caused me to be as I am, ye talk against me; ye impose upon me without shame.
4. Yea indeed of a truth have I erred; but an Erring One is camping right a long side of me, praising things that are not befitting, and he causeth my spoken words to err and to be unseasonable.
5. Also ye are magnifying yourselves against me and leaping upon me with reproach.
6. Know of a surety that the Lord it is that hath stirred me up and raised on high his wall against me.
7. Lo, I laugh at reproach; I will not talk; I will cry out, and nowhere is there judgment rendered.
8. I am built up around, and I cannot go through it; darkness hath set upon my face.
9. He hath stripped off my glory, and taken away my crown from my head;
10. He hath scattered me about and I am gone, and he hath cut off my hope like a tree:
11. He hath used me terribly in wrath and accounted me an enemy as it were;
12. His trial tents with one accord have come upon me; seated in my ways they have encompassed me;
13. My brethren have stood away from me; they have recognised strangers rather than me; and my friends have come to be without mercy.
14. My nearest have not made themselves nigh to me; and those who know my name have ignored me.
15. Neighbors and the female courtiers of my household even; I was at another race in their sight;
16. My male courtier I called and he did not hear; my mouth besought;
17. And I entreated my wife; with flattery I invoked the sons of my concubines;
18. But they had cast me off forever; when I stood up they spoke against me;
19. Those who saw me abominated me; those whom I had treated with love stood up against me:
20. In my skin my flesh hath become corrupt; and my bones are possessed with woes;
21. Have mercy upon me, have mercy upon me, O friends; for the hand of the Lord is it that hath touched me.
22. Why do ye also pursue me even as doth the Lord; and why are ye not satisfied with my flesh?
23. Would that some one would grant that my spoken words be written; that they might be put in the book forever (εις τον αιωνα for all time here;)
24. That they might be engraved with an iron pen and in lead, or in rocks;
25. For I know there is an Everlasting One who is going to release me upon the earth;
26. Who will stand up my skin that is going through these (trials). For from the Lord have these things been summed up to me:
27. Things which I know well of myself; things which mine eye hath seen and not another's; they have all been summed up to me in my bosom.
28. And if ye say forsooth, what shall we say in his sight, and what root of discourse shall we find in him;
29. Stand back ye also in reverent awe from the veil; For anger will come forth upon the transgressors, and then will they comprehend where their fuel for the fire is.

REPORT OF WORK IN THE LORD'S VINEYARD.

By invitation I attended the quarterly conference of the state of Michigan, held at Dutton, beginning May 28th. I had long desired to visit the Michigan brethren and become acquainted with them and gladly embraced the opportunity of doing so.

Dutton is the home of Brother B. W. and Mary Woodward. It is also the home of Bro. Woodward's mother.

The social meeting on Saturday morning was one of the best meetings that I ever attended. It was indicative of what the meetings to follow would be. The interest culminated on Sunday night, when thirteen rose up for baptism. On Monday Bro. Woodward immersed seven of the number. The meetings were continued until Wednesday night, when seven more came out. Of this number Bro. Woodward baptised four on Thursday. The meetings were adjourned Wednesday night and on Thursday I went to Watson, Mich. by invitation of the brethren, and commenced meeting Thursday night and held over Sunday. Bro. Woodward went over to Watson on Saturday and assisted in the meetings. The brethren at Watson have one of the neatest and best arranged churches that I ever saw. They have a membership of about forty of as earnest, intelligent Christian people as I ever had the pleasure of meeting. The interest was very good at all the meetings and especially so on Sunday night. After the sermon we had the communion service, and after the bread and wine were passed Bro. Woodward who was presiding at the table, said "We will sing a song and go out." The song was selected and announced but the brethren were so full of the things relating to the glorious hope and the soon coming kingdom of our Lord and Master, that they could not separate without speaking of their hope and exhorting each other to hold out to the end. In this way the time was spent until near eleven o'clock, when we were compelled to say good by, hoping that we may have the privilege of again meeting this side the kingdom. When I went to Watson I had intended remaining until Thursday following but Bro. Woodward thought I had better go back to Dutton and hold some more meetings, which I did. And as a result on Tuesday night we had the pleasure of seeing Bro. Cole, an old friend and neighbor of Bro. Woodward raise up in his place and say that he had served the devil as long as he was going to, that henceforth he, with God's help, would serve the Lord. The next day he was baptised into the name of the dear Lord by Bro. Woodward and we left him, with many others rejoicing in the hope of immortality. Thus ended my first visit to the brethren in Michigan and my prayer is that the good Father will spare my life that I may again have the privilege of visiting these and other brethren in that state. Thursday morning, in company with Bro. Woodward, I left for Antioch to attend the Quarterly Conference of the brethren in Indiana.

HOME INSTRUCTION.

There seems to be a growing tendency to consign education, moral, scientific and mechanical, entirely to the hands of the public teachers. This is all wrong. When the Lord organised a nation he enacted a school law. "Of systems possibly he chose the best." He commanded the parents to teach their children, Deut. vi. 6, 7 and all experience has shown that the further teaching is removed from the parent's hands, and the more parents try to shirk this duty the worse for the child, the parents and the state. If parents do not feel qualified to teach all that the schools claim to teach, they have this qualification, they have a real and unselfish interest in the child which reaches beyond examination day. Teach them the good and useful things which you know, it is better that they should learn of you than go away and learn of some foreign "Scientist" or "Artizan," who neither fears God or regards man. In Iceland, where crime is rare and illiteracy almost unknown, the children are taught at home. When we remove teaching from the home we take an important timber from the house.

A. S. CLOUGH.

The church of God at Cleveland, O., will hold meetings at 10:30 a. m. every Sunday (D. V.) in Hand and Heller's Block, Room 16, 3765 Ontario Street, Corner of Bolivar, north of Central Market. Seats free. Brethren from abroad of like faith and all searchers after truth are welcome

Friends, you who are at work in the Master's vineyard, think of this chance offered you from week to week to get the book that gives the foundation of our hope in the clearest manner possible, for so little money. It is not right for these books to remain long on our shelves. There is work for them all over the land. "Key Words" is another work by the same author, former price 25c.; now 15c.; and "Theanatopsis," former price 10c.; now 5c.

Have you any smart infidels in your neighborhood? Do they sneer at and ridicule your views of the Bible? If you have we have a little work here that will aid you in routing them completely, and if you have none near you now you can scarcely stir many miles without meeting one, and if you are posted in their theories you have already won half of the battle. Sister Reed's little book, "Creation vs. Evolution" is the work we refer to, and all should possess a copy. Price 25c.

Our lamented Brother Magruder's "Reply to Ingersoll" is another book that should be more largely circulated. It is just what its name indicates—a Reply to Mr. Ingersoll—a reply that Mr. Ingersoll or any other infidel will not even try to answer, so it stands, for its foundation is laid in God's holy word. Price 50c.

The Gift of Life Eternal through Jesus Christ is the great subject for us. Eternal Life a Free Gift. Brother J. H. Pettengill has written a book on this subject, and all who read it say the work is well done. We can send you a copy for $1.00.

We write and talk much of the Kingdom and its Restoration. Brother Silas Henn has written a book on this subject that will aid us very much in our study of the Kingdom and the wonders of the Restoration. One dollar will place it on your table.

There have been different ages and dispensations in the past—we live now—there is an Age to Come, and Bro. Weethee has told us in his work this subject, the result of his l... search as to the nature and ... inity of the age coming hereaf... This is a large book of over 500 pages. Price $3.00.

Space will not admit of mention of half what our shelves contain. The Emphatic Diaglott, by B. Wilson; Christ's Kingdom, Where is it and What is it? by Jos. Leclar; A Translation of Matthew's Gospel, by Chas. Gardner; that grand work, A Letter to a Friend, by Mrs. Woodruff; Which is Right? or Is Christ's Throne in Heaven or on the Earth? by Thos. Wilson; When Shall These Things Be? by H. Bowman; A Letter to a Baptist Minister, by Daniel Howard; the Doctrine of Baptism, besides a host of those little silent leaflets that work all the time. When you are resting, being worried, they keep on. Who will help circulate these books? They are all good. There may be an isolated expression that some might object to, but the teaching in the main is endorsed by all our best writers and thinkers. We are ready to fill your orders. See advertisements in other parts of this paper.

CALLED ASIDE.

"I have somewhat to say unto thee."

Called aside!
From the glad working of thy busy life,
From the world's ceaseless stir of care and strife,
Into the shadows by thy heavenly Guide,
For a brief space thou hast been called aside.

Lonely hours
Thou hast spent, weary, on a couch of pain,
Watching golden sunshine, falling rain,
Hours whose sad length only to Him was known,
Who trod a sadder pathway, dark and lone.

Laid aside!
May not the little cost of suffering be
A loving one of blessing given to thee?
The cup of chastening sent thee from above
By Him who bore the cross whose name is Love?

Called aside!
Hast thou no memories of that "little while"
No sweet remembrances of thy Father's smile?
No hidden thoughts that wrapped thee in their fold,
Of Him who did such light and grace unfold?

Called aside!
Perhaps into a desert garden dim;
Yet not alone, when thou hast been with Him,
And heard his voice in sweetest accents say,
"Child, will thou not with me thy still hour stay?"

Called aside.
In hidden paths with Christ thy Lord to tread;
Deeper to drink at the sweet Fountain-head;
Closer in fellowship with him to roam,
Nearer, perchance, to tread thy heavenly home.

Called aside!
Oh, knee-deep deeper grows with him alone,
In secret all his deepest love is shown,
And learnt, in many an hour of dark distress,
Some rare, sweet lesson of his tenderness.

Called aside!
We thank Thee for the stillness and the shade;
Thank thee for hidden paths thy love hath made;
And so that we have wept and watched with thee,
We thank thee for our dark Gethsemane.

Called aside!
Oh, restful thought—he doeth all things well.
Oh, blessed sphere with Christ alone to dwell.
Ev, in the shadow of thy cross to hide,
We thank thee, Lord, to have been called aside.

MICA-PEN NOTES.

I have just read a sermon by Mr. Talmage, with this text from Isaiah, "For the Lord delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married." Now there are many good things in this sermon, as in others of this Brooklyn preacher, but how is it that he and so many other notable men, ignore the coming second advent of our Lord? Is the matter of no consequence? Is it [illegible] with any minister or him to substitute a future of human opinion for tradition for the positive teaching of the New Testament? Is it immaterial whether or not there is a faithful premonition of the personal coming of the Monarch and King, or utter and absolute silence concerning it? I look in vain in this discourse for one solitary hint of the expected presence of the Noblemen. There is not a syllable of intimation of that glorious fact that Jesus will quickly come. No. And with all the concussions of genius, or all the fire of eloquence, or resources of rhetoric, how is this great omission to be facilly acquiesced in, as of no concern or account?

Yet it is but part of a grand characteristic of our times. There is plenty of talent, plenty of learning and oratory. How is it that in oceans of talk, and in pyramids of sermons, there is not a word about the second advent of the Best Beloved? Why is the seal of silence set on this foremost doctrine of God's word? I hear earnest words about education and reformation, and read infinite philosophy of doctors and teachers, but why is the grand remedial power of the Coming excluded, as if it were as much a myth as a Swedish legend or an old wives' fable? How is it that the truth of inspiration is eviscerated and turned upside down? How is it that all the potencies of human wisdom and all the rainbow glories of human prophecy and philosophy are commended to our faith, and prescribed as remedies for our sickness, and lights for our darkness, while the mighty power of our returning Savior is hidden from our sight, as if it were a thing unnecessary or incredible, superfluous or visionary? Alas! Among all silences what is more painful and astonishing than this? Of what avail are the potencies of human thunder in speech, with the glory of the kingdom of God left out? To what purpose or effect all the schemes, reasonings and propositions of our foremost philosophers and doctors, without the medicine of the second coming of Christ to the poor troubled and trembling earth.

It is as Jesus said it should be. When he comes "will he find the faith on the earth?" Rare indeed, but not totally wanting. And especially rare in high places, among men of wisdom and influence, reputation and standing. Everything and anything is prophesied and recommended but the one grand remedy. Among all things to eschew and to be very careful not to introduce is the second coming. This is the one grand idea that is to be sedulously and scrupulously evaded and avoided. That is the one fanaticism to be careful not to meddle with. Our Lord may be praised and prayed to, but not looked for. His coming is spiritual and not literal. So we are, to all intents and purposes, instructed from the pulpits of the land. He who comes into an Orthodox meeting must be careful not to ruffle its calmness with any such startling or fanatical thing as a doctrine of the Lord's coming again in our day. No matter for labor troubles or other troubles. No matter for convulsions in nature, or perils in politics and government. Remedies, or pan-panaceas, or prophecies of coming good, are easy and in plenty; but when a Savior, "nigh at hand to come," is proposed, there is almost anger or consternation. I know a church in this Massachusetts city where the pastor would not allow the topic of the second advent to be introduced.

But I was speaking of Talmage's sermon. "Thy land shall be married," says he. And what land is it of which the prophet speaks? It is surely right to ask. I thought certainly it was the land of Israel. I did indeed. I thought it was the beloved land of promise, the land chosen in divine love and intention. I thought it was. In the first verse Zion and Jerusalem are arguments for God's irrepressible activity. Gentiles are called to witness the coming righteousness and glory. Again, further on, watchman shall stand on city walls. Those who speak of God are called on to pray for the stability and glory of that very city, and its name is Jerusalem. The land circumjacent to Jerusalem, that is the land "to be married."

But Talmage says not a solitary word of that, as I remember. He is devoted to America, to the United States, and plainly implies that the holy Messiah will make this country his bride. He says there are some bad and dangerous suitors, to-wit, monopoly and anarchy and infidelity, and truly they are a bad and very objectionable set. But why should any influential public teacher glorify the United States at the expense of the majestic land of promise, now desolate, but destined to be the world's principal metropolis? Why and how, O eloquent Brooklyn friend, couldst thou so forget and so misapply the meaning and purpose of the God of Israel? Whatever may be the glory and greatness of the United States in a coming age, after the storm of judgment now rising has swept the world, how couldst thou forget that Jerusalem and Judea shall be the center of the habitable earth, and that all countries, however fair and great, shall be tributary to the land of Israel? How couldst thou forget it, though thou be an acknowledged champion of virtue and master of rhetoric?

Ah, how needful now for the pure and serene ray of that heavenly light to shine upon our minds, that we may see the unveiled glory! The key is "the kingdom to come," the first petition in the Lord's prayer. Many men say it has come long ago, but we say, we believe and testify that it is yet to come, and that it is even at the door. That its coming is coincident and concurrent with the personal coming of the long absent Son of man. O glad and solemn assurance! O era of coming wonders in which we live! But O, mist and mystery of much wrong and mistaken teaching, that is but rubbish in comparison with the glory of that grand consummation whereof Christ is the very sole author and substance, beginning and condition! What great things are in anticipation! But O how different from the pictured glory of an earth in imagined halcyon of bliss, with no personal Lord and Savior set front and foremost and in the midst of all things. We want Jesus, truly in person, and the whole dizzy and bewildered earth needs him, and not the misleading and false forecast of any theology or doctrine that leaves out our pulsant divine Chief. The world is weary of weak and vain medicines.

And now a word of comfort to the scattered and absent saints. Some of you are in affliction. Many are tried and troubled, but you do well to remember those four good and grand words of the Great Friend, "Have faith in God." Don't think the words are one whit less apt and forcible now than in Mark or Luke's day. They are four noble words for us in our trials. Let us take them and obey them. What a world of medicine there is in them! It is command, advice and exhortation, all there in one. If we obey the command we live. If we disregard the advice we languish, we are discouraged and weak. Think! it is the Lord that speaks. He says, do it, and we can. We can teach and train our halting and fainting minds. We can believe, and when we do, we suddenly rise. We are with God, we are alongside of him, we are in grand company, we are above our fears and sorrows. We catch the secret of good cheer. We drink new wine and milk. We walk with Jesus as conquerors, even though we wear poor clothes or lack fulfilment of some fond creature hopes, or feel tossed and dashed about with adversities.

And now I will tell you, secretly, another thing we can do. We can take our enemies, if we have any, those who have wronged or slighted or disappointed us, we can take them, one by one, in our faith to God. One by one, we can take them to him, and by faith shut them in with him, and to save their lives they cannot help themselves. When we have so taken them, they are there, and don't let us forget it. This is the privilege of saints, this is the power of faith. We must do it kindly, but we can do it in dead earnest. And what shall we say? We can say, "Lord, do what thou seest best, both to and for them. Do according to thy wisdom. Teach them what thou will. They are with thee. Thou art witness that I have brought them to thee and shut them up with thee." Those words, "have faith in God," are key words. They open doors. They overcome troubles. They are masterly and even magical. By them darkness flees away. By them burdens drop off. By them there is a great mounting up on eagle's wings. By them Christ is incomparably lovely. We admire him for giving us such grand counsel. We are thankful for such exalted privilege. By those words we rise unto the company of the best that ever lived. So, be comforted, O saints, be comforted.

Truth.

Be true in everything you do,
Be true to all you say;
Seek simply truth; and naught therefrom,
And, too, take naught away.

Seek not to hide the truth from sight;
'Tis easy to deceive;
Yet one untruth, however slight,
A giant web may weave.

Procrastination is a sin
That thrives in every heart,
Unless we strive the day to win
And make the foe depart.

May we be true as in God's sight,
Honest to everything;
True ever to our sense of right,
True to our God and King!

The Pillar of Love.

In a certain district in Russia there is to be seen, in a solitary place, a pillar with this inscription: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." That pillar tells a touching tale, which many must have heard. It was a wild region, infested with wolves, and as a party traveled along it soon became plain that those were on their track. The pistols were fired; one horse after another was left to the ravenous wolves, till, as they came nearer and nothing else remained to be tried the faithful servant, in spite of the expostulations of his master, threw himself in the midst of them and by his own death saved his master. That pillar marks the spot where his bones were found; that inscription records the noble instance of attachment. But there is another nobler still. There is another pillar, and on it I read, "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." That pillar is the Bible—the noble pillar of Scripture—written all over with loving words, telling of salvation.

"You Did it."

Little Bessie was dying. Her father had struck the child a blow on the spine while insane from the influence of rum, and confusion and terror overwhelm the frantic household, for little Bessie is beloved by all.

Among those of the neighbors who had gathered in amid the excitement was the rumseller who had dealt out the poison to that neighborhood for years. He drew near the death-bed, and heard a watcher, who was wiping the death-damp from the child's beautiful face, say, "That blow has killed her." Little Bessie caught the whisper, and raising her eyes that were growing large in death, she fixed a dying gaze on the rumseller, and said "You did it!" and in a few minutes was dead.

That group never forgot the dying child's charge, and the rumseller says that it haunts him day and night; and yet he continues to deal out the fatal beverage to his victims. Every one of us who does not rise up and assist in crushing this brazen serpent is guilty before God, and the rumseller will say of us: "They who are not against us are for us;" and more than one "Little Bessie" will say, "You did it."

Yes! the wholesale murder of innocents will not cease until this traffic ceases, and today millions of voices are crying to us from the grave, "You did it."—The Christian Home.

Just Three Things.

"I once met a thoughtful scholar," says Bishop Whipple, "who told me that for years he had read every book he could which assailed the religion of Jesus Christ, and he said he should have become an infidel but for three things. First, I am a man. I am going somewhere. Tonight I am a day nearer the grave than I was last night. I have read all such books can tell me. They shed not one solitary ray of hope or light upon the darkness. They shall not take away the only guide and leave me stone-blind. Second. I had a mother. I saw her go down into the dark valley where I am going, and she leaned upon an unseen arm as calmly as a child goes to sleep on the breast of its mother. I know that was not a dream. Third, I have three motherless daughters (and he said with tears in his eyes), They have no protector but myself; I would rather kill them than leave them in this sinful world if you blot out of it all the teachings of the gospel."

Dear Children:

In the east of Jerusalem, by a gate called the sheep gate, there was a pool, the name of which signifies, "The house of mercy." It was entered by five porches, in which lay a great multitude of people, waiting for the moving of the water. They were all suffering from different diseases which no medical man could cure.

It must have had the appearance of a hospital as some of the sick were brought on beds, and laid there. The blind would grope their way hopeless no doubt, as it was impossible for them to see when the waters moved, which they anticipated would effect the cure. The lame whose bodies were bent with acute suffering would manage to get there, longing for the certain season to come when they would be made whole, and the weary withered ones, whose lifeless limbs made it a burden to live, sought this house of mercy. For an angel went down at a certain season into the pool, and troubled the waters. Whosoever then first after the troubling of the water stepped in was made whole of whatever disease he had. We can imagine the difficulty of one who had been a suffering cripple for thirty-eight years. Having no power to raise himself in haste, and step in first at the moving of the waters. No doubt his bed was placed close to the edge of the pool, and many a season his weary eye had watched with intense earnestness patiently waiting for the precious blessing. He had probably been looking at the throng going in at the beautiful gate of the Temple, and wished he also could blend his voice in their sweet song of praise. How wearisdly the hours must have passed; as he listened to the sad moaning of the afflicted who with him were patiently watching the first gentle ripple of the slumbering waters. The very thought that only one could gain the invaluable gift of health must have filled such a helpless one with bitter despair, especially as he was too poor to have an attendant. It being the Sabbath, perhaps many passed from porch to porch carelessly gazing at the weary sick, and little did they imagine, that one had come there, who possessed more than the healing qualities of the water in himself. The touching tender sympathy of Jesus understood his trying condition exactly. Instead of going to the Temple, he was doing his heavenly Father's business in healing and comforting the afflicted. The poor cripple did not tell Jesus how long he had been sick. His chief anxiety was to find some kind friend who would tarry with him until the moving of the waters. He knew not it was Jesus, who had just healed the nobleman's son, and had come there to bless him also.

Jesus said, Wilt thou be made whole? The impotent man answered, Sir, I have no man when the water is troubled to put me into the pool, but while I am coming another steppeth down before me. Jesus saith unto him, Rise, take up thy bed and walk, and immediately the man was made whole and took up his bed, and walked, and the same day was the Sabbath. He who had healed the sick man said, The Son of man is Lord of the Sabbath, or "rest," and the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath. Afterward Jesus saw him in the Temple and said to him, "Behold thou art whole, sin no more lest a worse thing come upon thee." Children beloved, there are no doors to the house of mercy, the porches are always open and Jesus is there, seeking those who are willing to be made whole, and when we are whole his only command is, Sin no more.

Kingdom and the Restoration.

Or, A Scriptural View of the Second Coming of Christ, with the Wonderful Signs that will Precede it, and the still more Wonderful Things that will follow it.

—By Silas Henn.—

NOTICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS:

The book is tasteful, reverent and instructive, every way worthy of the attention of those who prefer calm argument to sensational speculation.—The Rainbow.

We are desirous to express our sympathy with the general scope of the book, and to bespeak for it a wide and cordial reception.—The Messenger.

The volume before us is evidently the product of a thoughtful mind, and deserves the careful study of every Christian, being of a very comprehensive character, and based on Scripture. Certainly it is the best work on the subject which has come under our notice.—The Sydney Observer.

The treatment shows that the author has studied well and patiently digested his theme before willing upon it, and we feel as we read page after page, stimulated rather than clogged in our inquiry.....The aim of the volume before us is to set the truth clearly before the mind, and so restore to its place in the consciousness of the church the hope that was once so dear to God's suffering saints, and is still so to many, but which is always unwelcome to a worldly, cold and formal church, and hated by the world. This little volume will be received and read with pleasure by all who take interest in prophetic subjects.—Rev. Nathaniel West, D. D.

THE COMING AGE,

—ITS—

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. Weethee.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the answers are enquiring "What are the signs of his coming!" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that His supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, Art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXV. Read PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JULY 7, 1886. NO. 25.

THE RESTITUTION,

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR,

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and baptism as pre-requisite to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Communications.

THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM. No. 7.

There is another class of passages which are supposed to teach a present existence of the kingdom of God. One of these is Luke xvi. 16, "The law and the prophets were until John; since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it."

If "the kingdom of God," here, mean the church, or the influence of truth upon the hearts and minds of believers, how does this agree with the fact that only a comparative few became the disciples of our Lord during his whole ministry? We are informed regarding John's mission that "then went out to him Jerusalem and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan, and were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins." But no one would maintain that those persons were in the Christian church. The ministry of our Lord had not then begun. This success of John's mission was only temporary. Jesus said to the Jews regarding John and his mission, "He was a burning and a shining light, and ye were willing for a season to rejoice in his light." But the mission of our Lord never at any time had the success of that of his predecessor; the reasons for which we shall see anon.

If this text proves anything as to the "setting up" of the kingdom of Christ, it proves too much; for it would prove that it was set up by John the Baptist, who preached the kingdom several years before our Lord's ministry began. And it must be distinctly [illegible] that neither John nor Jesus [illegible] a present kingdom, but one to [illegible] kingdom of God is at [illegible] the burden of gospel preach- [illegible] both by John and our Lord. And the disciples of our Lord after having believed this preaching, were taught to pray "thy kingdom come," and exhorted to "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," and were pointed forward to the future for its possession in such terms as these: "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

Besides, if Jesus meant to teach here that the kingdom had been "set up," why did he simply say it was "preached?" His hearers well knew that it was preached as only "at hand," and had been so preached for about seven years at the time our Lord uttered these words. And they had no reason to think that in any sense it had come or been set up.

But how, then, are we to understand the words, "Every man presseth INTO it?" Here, however, everything depends on the rendering of the Greek preposition represented by "into." It must be kept in mind that "into" might just as well be "unto," or "towards," or even "for." The Roman Catholic version makes it "towards." "Every one useth violence towards it." If we retain part of the Common Version we shall have the exact truth, "Every one presseth towards it." But "towards" is not such a frequent rendering of εἰς as "unto," and I should, therefore, prefer "UNTO." "Every one presseth unto it." Now assuming that the pronoun "it" has for its antecedent "the kingdom," the question is, seeing that John and Jesus proclaimed a coming kingdom, "at hand," but not as yet come or set up, In what sense could the people press unto it? Simply by embracing every opportunity of showing the extreme interest they took in the prospect of a "restoration of the kingdom again to Israel," which prospect was certainly excited by the proclamation referred to. Thus we read that "when Jesus perceived that they would come and take him by force to make him a king, he departed again into a mountain alone." This was the multitude who had just been miraculously fed, of whom we are told in the verse preceding the above, "Those men when they had seen the miracle that Jesus did, said, 'This is of a truth that prophet that should come into the world.'" John vi. 14, 15. The rulers of the people were of quite a different mind. We read that, after the raising of Lazarus, "then gathered the chief priests and the Pharisees a council, and said, what do we? for this man doeth many miracles. If we let him thus alone, all men will believe on him; and the Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation." These two passages show the state of thought and feeling prevalent among the people and their rulers respectively, as to our Lord and his ministry; and the former clearly shows the manner of pressing unto the kingdom, on the part of the mass of the people, for the ruling party must certainly be excluded.

But while Jesus and his preaching was thus popular, why was it that so small a portion of the people became his true followers by a sincere and hearty belief of the gospel of the kingdom, and rendering obedience in the appointed way to its Anointed King, as their Lord and Master? Simply, by intimidation exercised by the ruling party. Thus the Pharisees and the parents of the man born blind: "They asked them, saying, Is this your son, who ye say was born blind? how then doth he now see? His parents answered them and said, We know that this is our son and that he was born blind: but by what means he now seeth we know not; or who hath opened his eyes we know not: he is of age; ask him: he shall speak for himself. These words spake his parents BECAUSE THEY FEARED THE JEWS: for the Jews had agreed already that if any man did confess that he was Christ, HE SHOULD BE PUT OUT OF THE SYNAGOGUE." Jno. ix. 19–22.

I trust those remarks will suffice to show that the text we have dealt with has no reference to a kingdom then in existence, but exclusively to one to come.

There is a similar passage in Matt. xi. 12, "From the days of John the Baptist until now, the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force."

"From the days of John the Baptist" here, probably refers to the period subsequent to the death of John, and applies only to the ministry of our Lord, which did not begin till after the ministry of John had been closed by his imprisonment. It is contended that it refers to the period beginning with the preaching of John. I beg to refer the reader to the remarks in the third paragraph of this article. The question then is, how did the kingdom of heaven suffer violence? and, how could the violent take it by force? As we have already seen the Scribes and Pharisees were opposed to the preaching of John and of our Lord and his apostles, and also to those who believed it, and confessed that he was the Christ—the Anointed for the coming kingdom. It consequently required both courage and zeal on the part of such as were determined to become his followers, and inherit with him the kingdom when it should be set up. They had to brave the decree of excommunication which had been resolved upon by the rulers of the synagogue, as well as the obloquy of being the followers of one whose lowly condition was altogether incommensurate with his claims to be the Messiah.

I may note that the word rendered "suffereth violence" has for one of its meanings in the Polymerian Lexicon "desired and sought with the greatest zeal and ardor," and the term rendered "the violent," "one who feels an eager, vehement desire for anything." This is quite in keeping with the circumstances of the case, as I have endeavored to point them out.

The previous verse also throws light on the point as to the absolute futurity of the kingdom, "Verily I say unto you, Among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist: notwithstanding, he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he." That is, John, as a prophet endowed with the Holy Spirit is not surpassed by any of Israel's prophets of past times. Notwithstanding this, however, he that is least in the kingdom or heaven (when it shall be established) is greater than John is at present, he being but mortal flesh and blood. If the disciples of our Lord were in the kingdom when these words were spoken, how could it be said with any propriety that they were greater than John. John was directly endowed with the Holy Spirit from his birth, and was charged with a special mission to Israel as the forerunner of our Lord, being styled "the Prophet of the Highest." This mission he prosecuted single-handed, and suffered martyrdom at the hands of Herod. They were but the chosen servants of our Lord, sent out in couples through the towns and villages to preach the gospel and heal the sick. It must, therefore, be in the future that the kingdom of God is to be established.

The next passage of this class is Matt. xxi. 31, 32. "Verily I say unto you, That the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you. For John came unto you in the way of righteousness, and ye believed him not: but the publicans and the harlots believed him: and ye, when ye had seen it, repented not afterward, that ye might believe him." This was spoken to "the chief priests and elders of the people," (verse 23) as forms our Lord's practical application of his parable of the father and his two sons. "A certain man had two sons; and he came to the first, and said, Son, go work today in my vineyard. He answered and said, I will not: but afterward he repented, and went. And he came to the second, and said likewise. And he answered and said, I go, sir: and went not. Whether of them twain did the will of his father? They say unto him, The first," verses 28, 31. That is, the son who actually did his father's bidding, apart from previous refusal or promise. Thus our Lord taught his disciples—"Saying, The Scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat: All therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works: for they say, and do not." Matt. xxiii. 2, 3.

Their self-righteous spirit rendered it more difficult for them to comply with our Lord's requisitions of belief and obedience of the gospel, than for persons who had previously made no pretension to good character, peculiar sanctity, or official position. So the publicans and harlots were said by Jesus to "go before the chief priests and elders of the people into the kingdom of God;" or as it might very well be rendered, "they go in advance of you toward or unto the kingdom;" by complying with the conditions of heir-ship. Yet another passage of this class falls to be noticed, Matt. xxiii. 13,—"Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men: for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in." These were the ruling and influential classes as we would say, both in church and state. Besides the influence of their example in refusing to acknowledge Jesus and obey his gospel, that had, as we have seen, passed a law that —"If any man did confess that he was Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue." Nevertheless there were some among this class who secretly believed on him, of whom probably Nicodemus was a specimen. John informs us, xii. 42, that "among the chief rulers also many believed on him; but because of the Pharisees they did not confess him, lest they should be put out of the synagogue: for they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God." And when the officers returned without having apprehended Jesus, saying "Never man spake like this man," the Pharisees said, "Are ye also deceived? Have any of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed on him?" But this people, who knoweth not the law, are cursed. Nicodemus saith unto them, (he that came to Jesus by night, being one of them,) Doth our law judge any man before it hear him, and know what he doeth? They answered and said unto him, Art thou also of Galilee? Search, and look: for out of Galilee ariseth no prophet." John vii. 46, 52.

Thus, they tried to "shut up the kingdom of heaven against men by refusing to press towards it themselves, and by using all their influence to prevent others from doing so.

It only remains to be noted here that the phrase "go in" which occurs twice in this verse, is in the Greek a compound word, of which the preffix is εἰς, meaning properly into, unto, or towards, as in the passages already quoted and examined.

Another passage requiring some notice is Matt. xxi. 43, "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." The parties here addressed were the same as on the occasions already examined, namely, the ruling classes, see verses 23, 45. As has already been admitted, those rulers were but the copartners and subservient tools of the usurpers of the kingdom of God—the Romans, under their viceroy Herod. Their administration of that kingdom, so far as it was permitted by its Divine King to have the semblance of existence, was purely by the sufferance of the Romans; and the chief priests were ready to cry out "we have no king but Cæsar," when their relationship to Rome, was supposed to be in danger. At an almost infinite distance, those priests and elders were the representatives of such divinely authorized rulers as Moses and Aaron, Joshua, Samuel, and David. But the kingdom of God was to be re-established under a new constitution, in virtue of which it should, according to Divine prediction by the prophet Daniel, ii. 34, "not be left to other people." This is to be realised by its being given to the Christ and his immortalised saints, a royal priesthood, an holy nation.

The fall of Jerusalem (A. D. 72) witnessed the departure of the last vestige of even that partial and nominal authority which was permitted to the Jewish nation, and which was exercised by the rulers when Jesus uttered the prediction we are dealing with. If any one should suppose that in their scattered condition since that event, the Jews have had, in any measure, the law of Moses administered among, as a rule Divine worship and practical life, through their Rabbis; even this shall be taken from them at the Advent of "him whose right it is to reign."

It is worthy of notice that if was future to the time when our Lord spoke that the kingdom is to be given to "a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." It is the future tense that is employed in both parts of the prediction —"shall be taken from you," and "shall be given to a nation." "Shall be" in the latter clause, though not necessary in the English idiom, is the full rendering of the Greek verb; and we have thus the futurity of both the "taking from" and the "giving to," distinctly recognized.

MICA-PEN NOTES.

I have a great respect for Alvan Clark & Son, of Cambridgeport, Mass. Their work is wonderful, and illustrative, being the elaboration and perfection of lenses for great telescopes, the largest and best in the world. And by telescopes we are brought nearer to God, in the unspeakable greatness and grandeur of his works. The largest and costliest of all lenses in the world, is now in the careful and intelligent possession and manipulation of these great workmen, an object glass of two matchless discs, three feet in diameter. Think how much care and patience were required in the beginning, by the English moulders, to provide a perfectly transparent pair of glasses without fault or flaw in the beginning. And then consider the exceeding care necessary in their handling, that there might be no such accident as a fracture, nay, nor the smallest approach thereto. Such a calamity must not for one moment be allowed to come within the category of even remote contingencies, if caution and forethought and watchfulness could prevent. And now when the precious product of the founders' skill is safely in the hands of the polishers, a great and responsible labor begins. Day by day, hour by hour, the eye, the patience, the industry, the concentrated attention of experienced and conscientious men is enlisted. There must be every possible care. Friction must be long and intelligently used, and hand-rubbing, with the finest polishing material at that, for weeks and months. Patience and painstaking are the law and atmosphere of the place. But the work even yet, must not be overdone, for a little excess, at any point, would ruin it.

When the glass is finished, and the telescope mounted in the observatory at Mt. Hamilton, Cal., what exultation, what sober, and elevated sense of achievement, does the occasion elicit, and also justify!

Now all this illustrates what God is doing in the preparation and perfection of his sons, the joint-heirs of the Prince. Christ and his elect saints, seem to be almost exactly illustrated by the first and crown-glass discs of the object glass. And, beloved friends, is this the work God is doing with you now? Is this the honor, he is pleased to enable you to attain? Is this the exalted destiny he is with carefulness and pains taking, fitting you to fulfil? Is he the kind and skillful and vigilant polisher? Are his eyes sharp, and is his touch true, and is his patience infinite? Does he prize his work and view it with ineffable interest, and care for it as if it were a treasure of immeasurable worth. If this be so, then it behooves the children waiting for the kingdom, to be patient, as God is, to be wise, to be harmless, to be thankful to the One who loves them, who touches them with his deft and wonderful hand. Think, when you remember that his eyes are upon you, what wonderful eyes they are! What intelligence, what gentleness, what infinite interest are expressed in their gaze, never to fast withdrawn from you. And so costly is the fabric, and so mysterious and careful is this work of preparing the mechanism by which God is to do all that is in his heart, in the ages to come! Love, grace, genius, patience, gentleness, generosity, and all these with unrelaxed fixedness and firmness of purpose, and boundless resources of power, these are the qualities of God, your God, and the qualities of his work, according to his eternal purpose in Christ Jesus. So then, according to that, life is worth something, and the coming of the Lord means something, and the resurrection of the dead has some signification and emphasis. In this view, it is no wonder that prophecy has a fascination, and the study of the great themes of human destiny, and Divine benevolence, a power which utterly shames the poor and childish excitement and chatter of those, into whose eyes the heavenly ray has not yet shone.

In reference to the courteous query, or mild objection, suggested by W. M. Russell, let me say, First: not all commentators are agreed that the two companies of 144,000 in Rev. vii. and xiv. are the same. Some suppose that the first represent Jews who are sealed for preservation from earthly calamities during the unparalleled troubles of this closing age. These may constitute the beginning and foundation of the vast and mighty millennial commonwealth of Israel. Second: But yet again it is worth observing that, strictly speaking, but one tribe, Judah, or at most, Judah and Benjamin, are to be classed as Jews. The remaining ten are, of course, Israelites, though for some reason Levi, which had no distinctly assigned territory, seems to be substituted for Dan. Questions arise which require much wisdom for their determination. If the twelve times twelve thousand are the same in the two chapters, then it seems natural to find the large majority among the Israelites who are Anglo-Saxons, upon the Anglo-Israel identification theory. The first fruit unto God on Mount Zion presents us but Judah only, as Jews, in the strictest construction. And I am not entirely certain but there may be Jews, by true hereditary derivation, not conscious of their racial peculiarity, (though seen and known by Omniscience), and who are Christians.

And lastly I will observe that the expression relating to their virgin purity is not in the Vatican manuscript, though it is in the Revised Version. But aside from this, original non-membership of churches seems not essential to virginity. This is a tribute to the cleansing power of the Spirit and word and blood of Jesus. Paul espouses the Corinthians to one husband, that he may present them as a chaste virgin to Christ. They were redeemed from the vicious atmosphere of a wicked city, and were even then faulty, but let us hope many were grandly developed Christians through grace. To me it seems that a soul thoroughly renewed may be counted as practically possessed of virginal purity, and this includes virginal purity of doctrine. The old rendering, "there was no guile in their mouth" was inaccurate. Of course not, guile in any Christian, but the fact is, there was no falsehood in their mouth, no wrong or false teaching. So I conceive. Now I express no positive conviction of identities. This much is true, a sealing is wonderfully and solemnly interesting, and so is a translation. May we be worthy. May we have grace. May we have faith. "Faith in God" is the motto for the conqueror and the signal cry of advance. Let us watch, watch the half-hidden operation of God's power and providence, watch little things as well as great, everything and all things that are the index of our Lord's thief-like parousia. The divine blessing be with you all. C. COLEBROOK.

THE JUDGMENT-SEAT OF CHRIST.

With regard to the judgment-seat of Christ, on which I have been asked to speak to you this evening, allow me to point out that which Scripture seems to reveal to my mind on the subject. It is called "The Judgment-seat of Christ," in distinction to the other two judgment-seats, viz., the judgment of the nations in Matt. xxv., at the ushering of Christ's millennial reign, and the great white throne judgment in Rev. xx. at the close of that reign. There are twenty-three passages which bear on this subject, one only of which I will quote, 2 Cor. v. 10: "We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad."

The characteristics of these three judgment-seats are (1) All believers in their resurrection bodies, in the air: 2 Cor. v. 10. (2) All living people, on the earth: Matt. xxv. 32. (3) All the dead, small and great: Rev. xx. 12. Let us now confine ourselves to the first "The Judgment-seat of Christ." First, when will it take place, and, secondly, where?

(1) When will it take place? At the hour which no man knoweth. As far as I can see from Scripture, it may take place at any time; it may be before we break up our gathering in this hall. It is not so in the case of the judgment of nations, or the great white throne judgment. There are various events recorded in Scripture which must take place before these last two; but the whole teaching as to the first, the watchfulness enjoined in Scripture with respect to the coming of our Lord, seems to me, although I do not wish to dogmatise, to be nullified if we are to look for any event previous to his coming in the air for his people, for then we should all be looking for that event instead of for his coming.

(2) Where will it take place? It will be in the air, in that region in which Satan is at this very moment carrying on his operations. In Eph. vi. 12 we have the expression, the heavenly places or the high places; "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." Now some people seem to think that Satan is shut up in some place under the earth. Would that it were so; but he is not; he is in the air! "The prince of the power of the air;" and not until the Lord Jesus Christ comes down and raises his saints will Satan be cast down to the earth. As we read in Rev. xii., "And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon, and the dragon fought and his angels, and prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in heaven. And the great dragon was cast out, the old serpent, called the devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world: he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him." "Woe to the inhabitants of the earth and the sea, for the devil has come down, having great wrath; because he hath but a short time." Then shall commence, under his organization, those days of tribulation such as has not been seen since the world began. Our Lord gathers his saints in the air, and judges them according to their works.

This will be done by three calls. Turn to that well-known passage in 1 Thess. iv. 16, which tells us that the Lord shall descend from heaven, first of all with a shout; then, secondly, with the voice of the archangel; and, thirdly, with the trump of God. The word translated "shout" is one which refers to the sound made by the chief captain of a ship in ancient days, to guide and give the time to the rowers. Thus the shout here refers to the Lord's own voice, which is spoken of in the Psalms as being heard upon the waters, and breaking the cedars, the "voice of the archangel and the trump of God." "Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

The distribution of the rewards to the saints is that which is to occupy us at that time. Have you noticed in your Bibles the italics in 1 Cor. v. 10? Reading without italics it runs thus, and I think explains itself; "We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things in body, according to that he hath done, whether good or bad." That needs no explanation; he is to receive in body. Where did he get this body? If we read it as many do with the italics, it certainly does lend color to the idea that the body spoken of refers to this body in which the things were done, but if we read it without the italics, it is that we may receive in body, according to that we have done, the result of our lives here. Now, where do we get that body, and when? It is the body received when the voice of the archangel calls us forth; the body with which we rise, like unto his glorious body; the body in which we shall be with him, and in which we shall reign with him.

Then, again, having been brought before this judgment-seat of Christ, I understand that it will deal with the things done in my body here, whilst then I am in my glorified body; and it is according to what I have done whether good or bad. I am not going to enter here into question of whether all the things I have ever done, or said, or thought, will be brought up individually, but I suppose we may look upon it as the word Bema implies, not as a criminal judgment-seat, but as a seat upon which the Judge sat to give Imperial crowns, as in John v. 24, to those who had gained prizes in the Grecian games of old. It is like the schoolmaster who gives the boys their prizes, the result of his having summed up all the good and all the bad marks; it does not follow that he necessarily tells out the number of good and bad marks, but he says to the boy, "There is your prize, the result of what you have done this quarter." Well, I believe that is what Christ will do at that judgment seat. He puts us all into our proper class for this purpose, in order that we may conduce to the greatest possible extent to his glory, when he comes down as in 2 Thess. ii., to strike the earth with the brightness of his presence. The practical lesson from all this is that whilst we are not saved by our works, we are to be judged by our works; whilst our condition is determined by grace, our position is to be determined by our works. "What manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness?" 2 Peter iii. 11.—By Shelto C. Douglas, in Prophetic News, and Israel's Watchman.

Russia's Big Programme.

The Russians have a presentiment that they will one day rule the world. Sooner or later the Muscovite will reign on the Bosphorus. Germany is Russia's only solid adversary. As long as Prussia retains her predominating position on the continent, all Russia's efforts to strengthen her influence in the East will prove sterile. But when France and Russia are united God's vengeance will not be far off.—Nouvelle Revue.

FROM Brother Joseph Bland of Kidderminster, England, we have received three pamphlets, one of which is entitled, "The Soul—What is it?" Another is, "Living Again," and the third is a lecture on "Russia and Britain in the East." They are forcibly written, and well calculated to enlighten all enquirers after truth on these important questions. From Hon. Selah Merrill, United States Consul, Jerusalem, Archæologist of the American Palestine Exploration Society, author of "East of the Jordan" and "Galilee in the Time of Christ," we have received an interesting tract, printed in the Holy City since the commencement of 1886, entitled "The Site of Calvary," which we shall probably more fully notice hereafter, and for which the author will please accept our most sincere thanks, as well as for other complimentary favors in time past.
